DOUCHE (F.), (modern Latin, ducia, (I.) docciare, 'to pour,') Cataclys'mus, Douse. This term is applied to a column of fluid, of a determinate nature and temperature, let fall upon the body. Pump'ing is a variety of the Douche. In using this kind of bath, the fluid is directed upon the part on which we are desirous of acting. The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus,—the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c.

Douches of air are occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. They are sent from an air-press—of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Syst.* Tetrandria Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. The property on which its medical virtues are dependent, resides in a volatile principle, which is impaired by long keeping, especially in powder. Dose, of the dried root, Dracontium, (Ph. U. S.,) ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafœtida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

DRACON'TIUM ANGUSTIS'PATHA, Symplocar'pus, Angustis'patha, Nar'row-spath'ed Skunkcabbage, is possessed of similar properties.

DRACUN'CULUS, (dim of draco,) *D. A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the areolar membrane and between the muscles; especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumour like a boil, which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

The morbid phenomena induced by the dracunculus have been termed Draconti'asis, (F.) Dracontiase.

The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

DYNAM'IC, Dynam'ical, Dynam'icus, (F.) Dynamique, (from dynamis.) In Mechanics, Dynam'ics investigates the powers whereby bodies are put in motion, and the laws connected therewith. In Biology, that which relates to the vital forces, to the organism in action, Vital Dynamics. The influences of agents on the organism, which are ascribable to neither mechanical nor chemical causes, are sometimes termed dynam'ic. In this sense, it is a favorite term with the homœopathists, who maintain that, by certain processes, called, in the aggregate, dynamiza'tion and potenti'zing, the dynamic powers of a medicine may be set free and developed — as by shaking the bottle in which the article is contained, or by mixing an unlimited number of unmedicated globules with one that is medicated, and shaking them together. In this way, the former become potentized.

DYNAMOM'ETER, Dynamiom'eter, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, (F.) Dynamomètre, (dynamis, and μετρον, 'measure.') An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 30 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.

From experiments made by Péron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Diemen's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

Natives of	Strength. of the arm.		of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Diemen's Land.	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland.	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor.	58.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France.	69.2	138.4	15.2	310.08
5. England.	71.4	142.4	15.2	332.52

Dynamometer or Dynam'eter, Medic''inal. An instrument devised by Dr. Paris, for the purpose of showing the quantity of active matter contained in a given weight or measure of any officinal compound, with the dose of any preparation, which will be equivalent in strength to a given quantity of any other of the same class. The instrument is more ingenious than useful.

When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia al'ba or sim'ple Dys'entery, My'codysenter'ia. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air, and imperfect nourishment: and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy. Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compositus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it.

The whole management in acute dysentery, must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

An epidemic dysentery prevailed in the 10th century, under the name Scitta.

In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon erethism of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

A state of the stomach, in which its functions are disturbed, without the presence of other diseases, or when, if other diseases be present, they are of but minor importance. The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are:— loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heart-burn; sense of fulness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course, more serious.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living, either in the quantity or quality of the food taken: and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute alkaline indigestion or neutral indigestion.

Ear, (Sax., eare,) Au'ris, Ous, Ac'oë, (Prov.) Lug. (F.) Oreille. The organ of audition. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bone; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions;—the outer or exter'nal ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the inter'nal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrinth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the mem'branous lab'yrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnius, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed, by De Blainville, vitrine auditive, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humour of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other,—the one termed the Sac'culus vestib'uli; the other Sac'culus. Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otolithes of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

wards, and the discharge is so profuse, that the head appears as if dipped in some glutinous liquid. By and by, the secretion dries into crusts and mats the hair into little separate tufts. The scalp gives evidence of inflammatory excitement, and the lymphatic ganglions of the neck are apt to become inflamed and suppurate.

It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c, but is not extensively used; and the cases are not always clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath—Bain électrique, as it has been called; which consists in placing the patient upon an insulated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The fluid may be communicated by points, sparks, or by shocks, according to the required intensity. See Electrization.

Lo'calized electriza'tion, (F.) Electrisation localizée, of Duchenne, of Boulogne, consists in concentrating the electric action in particular parts without electro-puncture or any surgical operation.

It is founded on the greater or less resistance presented by a tissue to electric currents, according to its state of dryness or of moisture; and may be practised by using wet sponges or a metallic knob covered with a piece of wet kid for deep-seated structures, as muscles or any internal viscus; and dry metallic bodies of varying shape, or a metallic brush, for the purpose of cutaneous electrization. Electrization may also be employed for diagnostic purposes; for example, the atrophied muscle of rheumatism contracts well under the galvanic stimulus, whilst the opposite is the case in fatty transformation of the muscular tissue. See Galvanization, localized.

A convenient form consists of a battery of six curved permanent magnets, and an intensity armature, around whose cylinders 1500 yards of fine insulated copper wire are coiled. The ends of the wire communicate respectively, with a pair of directors, each of which holds a piece of sponge, dipped in vinegar or a solution of common salt. When the armature is rotated, and a portion of the body is interposed between the directors, a succession of shocks is received.

ELEPHANTI'ASIS, (ελεφαντιασις,) Elephanti'a, Elephantias'mus, El'ephas, Laz'ari mor'bus seu ma'lum, Pachyder'mia, Phœnic''eus mor'bus, Phymato'sis Elephanti'asis, (ελεφας, gen. ελεφαντος, 'an elephant.) Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generally applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugous, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

Elephantiasis of the Antilles, Barba'does Leg, Gland'ular disease' of Barba'does, (F.) Jambes de Barbade, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Bucne'mia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen; skin thickened, livid, and rugous, often scaly; scrotum, arms, or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Bucne'mia Trop'ica, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

Elephantiasis Arab'ica, Tyri'asis, El'ephas, Elephanti'asis, E. In'dica, Elephanti'a Ar'abum, Le'pra Ar'abum (of some), Maladie glandulaire, Ladrerie, Yava Skin of the Polynesians [?]. In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the disease is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of an elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous areolar tissue: the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

Elephantiasis of Cayenne', Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

Elephantiasis of the Greeks, E. Græco'rum, is probably the same disease as Lepra.

Elephantiasis of In'dia is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumours, formed in the areolar texture. At a more advanced period, the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened; and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. For this form [?] the term Spiloplaxie was proposed by Duchaffaing. It, likewise, belongs to lepra.

Elephantiasis Italica, Pellagra.

Elephantiasis of Ja'va is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large white tumours on the toes and fingers, resembling scrofulous tumefactions. These tumours ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

ELEPHAN'TINUM EMPLASTRUM, (Ελεφαντινον.) An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of cerussa, 45 of wax, oil ℔ss, water ℔j. Oribasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but they are by no means similar in composition.

See Lever.

ELEVATOR, COM'MON. This is a mere lever, the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

ELEVATOR OF LOUIS differed from the last only in the circumstance of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

ELEVATOR OF PETIT' consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its butt-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned. By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

ELEVATOR TRIP'LOID, Vec'tis triploï'des. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.

This term is commonly applied to any white, crepitant, shining, elastic, indolent tumor of the integuments, caused by the introduction of air into the areolar texture, Aërodermecta'sia. Injuries of the larynx, trachea, or lungs; fractures of the ribs, or wounds penetrating the chest, are the most frequent causes of this affection, which is owing to the air escaping from the air-passages, and insinuating itself into the areolar texture surrounding the wound. There are some cases of emphysema, which are owing to internal causes; and hence a division has been made into the accidental and symptomatic, and the spontaneous and idiopathic.

A considerable pressure or contusion of the chest, or any violent concussion of the lung, may produce a laceration in that viscus, without injury being done to the parietes of the thorax, and may give occasion to the infiltration of air into the areolar texture, interlob'ular emphysema. La-önnec has described another species of emphysema of the lungs, Vesic'ular emphysema, Aéropneumonasie, Aéropneumonectasie of Piorry, consisting in excessive dilatation of the air-cells, some of which become as large as hemp-seed, ultimately break, and give rise to irregular vesicles at the surface of the lung, some of which are as large as a hazel-nut. Physical signs.—The thorax externally, generally or locally, appears unnaturally convex and prominent. The intercostal spaces are widened, but depressed. The inspiratory efforts are increased. The sound on percussion is morbidly clear, but not tympanitic. On auscultation, the inspiratory murmur is feeble or suppressed. The expiration, which is more frequently audible, is prolonged, laborious and wheezing. There are no certain physical signs which can distinguish interlobular emphysema from the vesicular.

Emphysema under the pleuro-pulmonalis is termed, by Piorry, Aérethmopneumonie.

EMP'IRIC or Empir'ic, Empi'ricus, (εμπειρικος, (from em, and μειρα, 'a trial,') 'experimental.') One who follows only experience. A sect of physicians, who rejected all theory, and took for their guide experience alone. It was opposed to the dogmatic sect. The Empiric sect prevailed till near the time of Galen. Among its most eminent members, after Philinus and Serapion, were Apollonius, Glaucias, Bacchius of Tanagra, and Zeuxis, both disciples of Herophilus,—Heraclides of Tarentum, Cleophantus (master of Asclepiades,) Menodotus of Nicomedia, and Theudas of Laodicea. They occupied themselves, chiefly, with discovering the properties of drugs, and did important service, in this manner, to medicine.

At the present day, the word Empiric is only taken in a bad sense, being employed in nearly the same signification as charlatan or quack.

Some of the plasters owe their consistence to wax and resin; and others to the chemical union which takes place between the semivitreous oxide of lead and oil. Most of them become too consistent by age. When such is the case, they may be remelted by a gentle heat, and oil be added to them.

An Emplastrum de Vigo sine mercu'rio seu Vigo'nis sine mercurio, (F.) Emplâtre de Vigo was, at one time, much celebrated as an adhesive plaster or sparadrap. In the Pharmacopœia of Wirtemberg, it was directed to be formed of living frogs and living earthworms boiled with various ordinary plaster ingredients, and other substances, and was termed Emplastrum rana'rum simplex seu de Ranis sine mercu'rio.

Melt the plaster and lard together, and as the mixture becomes thick, on cooling, sprinkle in the flies, and mix. Ph. L.) This is the common blistering plaster. Too much heat must not be used in its preparation. It requires to remain on six or eight hours before its full effect is induced, and it acts sufficiently well, provided even a piece of thin gauze or tissue paper be placed between it and the skin, whilst absorption of the flies is thus prevented. See Blister. The Blistering Cerate of the Ph. U. S., Cera'tum Canthar'idis, is made as follows:—Cantharid in pulv. subtiliss., ℥xij, Ceræ flavæ, Resinæ, āā ℥vij, Adipis, ℥x. To the wax, resin, and lard, previously melted, add the Spanish flies, and stir the mixture constantly until cool.

The Opera'tion for empye'ma properly means the making of an opening into the thorax for the purpose of giving issue to the matter collected in the cavity of the pleura, although it has been used for the operation required for the evacuation of any fluid from the chest, or synonymously with Paracentesis thoracis.

The cause of this smell is seated in an oil, called empyreumat'ie, which does not exist in the substance subjected to the operation, but is the result of its decomposition. If the empyreuma occurs when the organic substance is placed in a still with a liquid, it is owing to the solid matter touching the bottom of the vessel to which the fire is applied.

Its surface is very smooth and polished, and it forms a thicker layer towards the part where the teeth come in contact, and becomes thinner towards the cervix. The fibres of the enamel are perpendicular to the surface of the teeth, on the ivory of which they seem planted, as it were. This gives them a velvety appearance, when examined by the microscope. The enamel has no blood vessels, and is not renewed when removed, It is formed of phosphate of lime, and a very small portion of animal matter. This may be a congenital or accidental affection. In the former case, it is dependent upon tardy ossification of the fontanelles or some faulty conformation. In the latter, it is owing to some considerable loss of substance in the parietes of the cranium, produced by fractures, wounds with a cutting instrument, caries, the application of the trephine, &c. In slight congenital encephalocele, gentle pressure may be exerted upon the protruded portion. When the disease is of considerable extent, it is fatal. In accidental encephalocele, similar means must be used for confining the tumour, and preserving it from the action of external bodies.

In this disease, the heart's action is visibly increased, and very manifest to the touch; the hand is strongly repelled, and, at moments, is sensible of a trembling vibratory motion. Percussion gives a dull sound over a surface of several inches, owing, according to Bouilland, to the inflammatory turgescence of the heart, and the engorged state of its cavities. On auscultation, a bruit de soufflet is generally heard, masking one or both sounds of the heart: and the ear is sensible of a metallic ringing with each systole of the ventricle. The pulsations are rapid as well as strong, and, with few exceptions, irregular, unequal and intermittent. The pulse, by the way, does not always indicate the force or number of the heart's contractions.

The general conditions of the phenomena are—first, that they should have an affinity for the interposed membrane; and secondly, that they should have an affinity for each other, and be miscible.

At times, endosmose is used to signify the passage of the more transmissible fluid, whilst exosmose signifies that of the least transmissible.

The rapidity with which endosmose is accomplished varies according to the nature of the septum or tissue and of the penetrating body, and to the penetrability of the tissue.

The enduit is designated variously, according to its appearance,—enduit bilieux, jaune, blanc, &c.—a bilious, yellow, white coat or fur, &c. It is at times owing to the evaporation of the watery portions of the secretions; at others, to a morbid condition of the secretions;—generally, to both causes combined. The essential symptoms of this disease are:—violent abdominal pain, increased on pressure; with vomiting and inflammatory fever. Enteritis may affect both the peritoneal and the mucous coat of the intestines; and, in violent cases, all the coats may be implicated. The structure of the mucous and peritoneal coats is different; so are their functions in health and in disease. The inflammation of the serous coat, Seroënteritis, Exoenteritis, resembles that of the cellular membrane; the inflammation of the mucous coat, that of the skin. The former is usually, therefore, of a more active character. Inflammation of the mucous coat, Esoënteri'tis, Endoënteri'tis, Mucoënteri'tis, Mu'cous Enteri'tis, Phlegmymeni'tis enter'ica, is generally attended with diarrhœa, and its pathology is identical with that of dysentery. Inflammation of the peritoneal coat is, on the other hand, generally attended with constipation.

Enteritis of the peritoneal coat, for such usually is the meaning of the word in the abstract, requires the most active treatment. Copious bleeding, followed up by a large dose of opium—and, if the symptoms be not decidedly ameliorated, repeating the bleeding and opium—warm fomentations, and blisters, are the chief agents to be relied upon. Purgatives ought not to be exhibited until the inflammation and spasm are abated by the use of the bleeding and opium. When the physician is called early, this plan will usually succeed. Sometimes, Enteritis passes into a chronic state, requiring much careful management. Broussais considered inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and intestines as the proximate cause of the phenomena of fevers.

The treatment must of course vary according to the cause; and when the affection on which it is dependent cannot be removed, the discharge of urine may be prevented, by exerting a degree of compression on the urethra by means of appropriate instruments; or a urinal may be employed to receive the urine as it passes off.

(F.) Surpeau, Cuticule. A transparent, dry, thin membrane, devoid of nerves and vessels, which covers all the surface of the body, except the parts that correspond to the nails. It appears to consist of minute scales, placed one above the other. Chaussier considers it to be formed and reproduced by an excretory action of the true skin; to act like a dry varnish—Stratum Cor'neum—which prevents the immediate contact of bodies with the nervous papillæ, and consequently to deaden tactile impressions, which, without its intervention, might be painful. The Epider'mic, Epider'meous, or Epider'moid System, (as Bichat called it) in general anatomy, comprises three parts. 1. External Epidermis. 2. Epidermis spread over the mucous membranes. 3. It arises from the external iliac, on a level with the crural arch; sometimes by a trunk proper to it, at others by one common to it and the Obturator artery. It ascends upwards and inwards, behind the spermatic cord, follows the outer edge of the rectus abdominis muscle, and anastomoses, towards the umbilicus, with the internal mammary. The epigastric artery anastomoses, also, with the obturator, spermatic, lumbar, and intercostal vessels.

A collection of small, glandular granula, situate in the adipose, areolar texture at the base of the anterior surface of the epiglottis, in a triangular space, bounded anteriorly by the thyrohyoid membrane and thyroid cartilage. It pours out an unctuous and mucous fluid, which lubricates the epiglottis, keeps it supple and movable, and prevents the larynx from being irritated by the constant passage of the air, in the act of respiration.

EPIGLOT'TIS, gen. Epiglot'tidis, (επιγλωττις, gen. επιγλωττιδος.) Epiglot'tic car'tilage, Lig'ula, Oper'culum laryn'gis, Lin'gua Ex'igua, Lin'gula fis'tulæ, Sublin'guum, Superlig'ula. A fibro-cartilage, situate at the upper part of the larynx, behind the base of the tongue. Its form is oval; texture elastic; thickness greater below than above, and greater in the middle than at the sides. By its smaller extremity, which is the lower, it is attached to the thyroid cartilage; its two surfaces are covered by the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx. The special use of the epiglottis would seem to be to cover the glottis accurately at the moment of deglutition, and, thus, to assist in opposing the passage of alimentary substances into the air tubes.

(The word is derived from επιλαμβανω, 'future,' επιληψω, (ep, and λαμβανω, 'I seize,') 'I seize upon.') It is a cerebrospinal disease which may be idiopathic or symptomatic, spontaneous or accidental, and which occurs in paroxysms, with uncertain intervals between. These paroxysms are characterized by loss of consciousness and by convulsive motions of the muscles. Frequently, the fit attacks suddenly; at other times, it is preceded by indisposition, vertigo, and stupor. At times, before the loss of consciousness occurs, a sensation of a cold vapour is felt, hence called aur'a epilep'tica. This appears to rise in some part of the body, proceeds towards the head; and as soon as it has reached the brain the patient falls down. The ordinary duration of a fit is from 5 to 20 minutes. Sometimes it goes off in a few seconds; at others, it is protracted for hours. In all cases, there is a loss of sensation, sudden falling down, distortion of the eyes and face; countenance of a red, purple, or violet colour; grinding of the teeth; foaming at the mouth; convulsions of the limbs; difficult respiration, at times stertorous; with, sometimes, involuntary discharge of fæces and urine. After the fit, the patient retains not the least recollection of what has passed, but remains, for some time, affected with headache, stupor, and lassitude.

The disease is cerebrospinal, and is generally organic; but it may be functional and symptomatic of irritation in other parts, as in the stomach, bowels, &c. The prognosis, as to ultimate recovery, is unfavourable. It does not, however, frequently destroy life, but is apt to lead to mental imbecility. Dissection has not thrown light on its pathology.

To the attacks of epilepsy which are unaccompanied by convulsions, as is sometimes the case, the French give the name Petit-mal, and Épilepsie Vertige, Cer'ebral Ep'ilepsy. Fully formed epilepsy is the Grand-mal of the French. Spi'nal Ep'ilepsy. When furious mania succeeds to a paroxysm, it is termed Ma'nia epilep'tica and Epilep'tic Delir'ium.

In the treatment, the cause must be sought after, and if possible removed. In the paroxysm, but little can be done; but as the tongue is liable to be injured by the teeth, the jaws may be kept open by putting a cork or piece of wood between them. If the fit has been brought on by indigestible food, the stomach must be cleared. It is between the paroxysms that the great effort must be made. Generally, there is considerable irritability and debility of the nervous system, and hence tonics have been found the best remedies. Of these, perhaps, the most powerful, in epilepsy, is the argenti nitras, given regularly and continued for months, if necessary. Preparations of iron, copper, and zinc, have also been used, and vegetable tonics and antispasmodics in general. Counter irritants, as blisters, moxa, &c., may be employed, if necessary, along with this course.

Unfortunately, in many cases, these means are found insufficient, and all that can be done is to palliate, removiug carefully the exciting causes; such as the use of spirituous liquors, strong emotions, violent exercise, &c.; and regulating the diet.

This is one of the most common varieties of hemorrhage; the organization of the Schneiderian membrane being favourable to it, as the blood-vessels are but slightly supported. It does not generally flow from both nostrils, and is very apt to recur. Puberty is the period at which it is most common. Its exciting causes are:—any thing that will induce local congestions, as running, coughing, blowing the nose, &c., provided there is a disposition to it. A common case of epistaxis requires but little treatment, especially if in a young person. Light diet and a dose or two of the sulphate of magnesia will be sufficient. In more severe attacks, cold and astringent washes of alum, sulphate of zinc, weak sulphuric acid, or creasote, may be used, and the nostrils be plugged anteriorly; but if the bleeding goes on posteriorly, —Choanorrhag''ia—the posterior nares must be plugged likewise,—the patient being kept with the head raised, and on dry diet. The flow of blood has been arrested by directing the patient to stand up with his head elevated, compressing the nostril whence the blood flows with the fingers, raising the corresponding arm perpendicularly, and holding it in this position for about two minutes. A less vigorous circulation through the carotids appears to result from the increased force required to carry on the circulation through the upper extremity when raised. To prevent the recurrence, strict diet must be inculcated.

EPISTER'NAL, Episterna'lis, (επι, and στερνον, 'the sternum.') An epithet applied to two bones which form part of the sternum, and are situate upon its superior and lateral part. The thin layer of epidermis, which covers parts deprived of derma properly so called,—as the nipple, mucous membranes, lips, &c. Modern histological researches have shown that it exists, in different forms, pave'ment, cyl'inder, and vi'bratile or cil'iated epithelium. Tes'selated, pavement, sca'ly, lam'ellar, tubular, or flat'tened epithe'lium, Epithe'lium polyed'ricum, and E. lamello'sum, (F.) Épithélium pavimenteux, covers the serous and synovial membranes, the lining of blood-vessels, and the mucous membranes, except where cylinder epithelium exists. It is spread over the mouth, pharynx and œsophagus, conjunctiva, vagina, and entrance of the female urethra. Cyl'inder, colum'nar or prismat'ic epithe'lium, Epithelium cylin'dricum, (F.) Épithélium cylindrique is found in the intestinal canal, beyond the cardiac orifice of the stomach; in the larger ducts of the salivary glands; in the ductus communis choledochus, prostate, Cowper's glands; vesiculæ seminales, vas deferens, tubuli uriniferi, and urethra of the male; and lines the urinary passages of the female, from the orifice of the urethra to the beginning of the tubuli uriniferi of the kidneys. In all these situations, it is continuous with tesselated epithelium, which lines the more delicate ducts of the various glands. For the uses of the ciliated epithelium, Epithe'lium vi'brans, see Cilia.

Mr. Bowman has applied the term spheroid'al to a variety of epithelium, the cells of which, for the most part, retain their primitive roundness; or, being flattened where they touch, acquire a polyhedral figure. At times, these show a disposition to pass into the columnar, or the tesselated variety; and, hence, this form has been called the transit''ional. The spheroidal epithelium is found in the urinary passages, where it succeeds the columnar epithelium of the urethra at the internal orifice of that canal, and lines the whole of the bladder, ureters and pelves of the kidneys. It is found, also, in the excretory ducts of the mammary, perspiratory, and of many mucous, glands; and a modification of it lines the inmost secreting cavities or commencing ducts of glands generally.

EP'ITHEM, Epith'ema or Epithe'ma, gen. Epithem'atis, (επιθεμα or επιθημα, from epi, and τιθημι, 'to place.') From it originate several muscles of the forearm, to which it has given part of their names, according to the system of Chaussier.

EQUI'NIA, (equinus, 'belonging to a horse.') Gland'ers, (F.) Morve. A dangerous contagious disorder, accompanied by a pustular eruption, which arises from inoculation with certain diseased fluids generated in the horse, the ass and the mule. Two forms are met with,—E. mi'tis, contracted from horses affected with grease, and E. glandulo'sa, a dangerous and commonly fatal disease communicated to man, either in the acute or chronic form, from the glandered horse. The veterinary surgeons make two varieties of the disease in the horse—Gland'ers, Ma'lia, Malias'mus, Ma'liē, Malis, Malleus; and Far'cy gland'ers, Farcino'ma, Farci'men, Mal'leus farcimino'sus, Mor'bus farcimino'sus, Cachex'ia lymphat'ica farcimino'sa, (F.) Morve farcineuse, Farcin;—the former affecting the pituitary membrane and occasioning a profuse discharge from the nostrils, with pustular eruptions or small tumours, which soon suppurate and ulcerate, being attended by symptoms of malignant fever and by gangrene of various parts:—the latter being the same disease, but appearing in the shape of small tumours about the legs, lips, face, neck, &c. of the horse; sometimes very painful, suppurating, and degenerating into foul ulcers. They are often seen together.

The mild cases require little treatment but rest; the more severe generally resist all remedies.

It is formed of a collection of arteries and veins, intermixed with nervous filaments; the veins varicose, and contained in spaces formed by trabeculæ of fibrous tissue, being prolongations from the fibrous envelope. Smooth muscular fibres have been detected in it. This tissue exists in the corpora cavernosa of the penis and clitoris, at the lower and inner surface of the vagina, in the spongy part of the urethra, the lips, nipples, iris, &c. Sometimes it is developed accidentally, and constitutes a kind of organic transformation.

Augmentation of the vital phenomena in any organ or tissue. Or'gasm. Under this name, Mr. Pearson has described a state of the constitution produced by mercury acting on it as a poison. He calls it Mercu'rial Er'ethism or Erethis'mus. It is characterized by great depression of strength; anxiety about the præcordia; irregular action of the heart; frequent sighing; tremors; small, quick, sometimes intermitting pulse; occasional vomiting; pale, contracted countenance, and sense of coldness; but the tongue is seldom furred, nor are the vital and natural functions much disturbed. In this state any sudden exertion may prove fatal.

Ergot is generally considered to be the result of a disease in rye—Seca'lē cerea'lē—occurring most frequently when a hot summer succeeds a rainy spring. Decandolle, however, regards it as a parasitic fungus, and calls it Sclero'tium cla'vus; whilst Leveillé esteems it to be a fungus giving a coating to the diseased grain; the medical virtues residing in the coating. This parasitic fungus he calls Sphace'lia seg''etum. More recently, it has been maintained, that it is a diseased state of the grain occasioned by the growth of a fungus not previously detected, to which the names Ergotæ'tia abor'tans seu abortifa'ciens, Oï'dium abortifa'ciens, Ergotmould, have been given. It is found projecting from among the leaves of the spike or ear, and is a long, crooked excrescence, resembling the spur of a cock, pointed at its extremities, of a dark brown colour externally, and white within.

Ergot has been long used in Germany to act on the uterus, as its names Mutterkorn and Gebärpulver ('womb-grain,' pul'vis partu'riens, pul'vis ad par'tum) testify. Upwards of fifty years ago, it was recommended in this country for accelerating parturition; and since that period, numerous testimonials have been offered in its favour. Half a drachm of the powder is gently boiled in half a pint of water, and one-third part given every 20 minutes, until proper pains begin. Some recommend the clear watery infusion; others advise the powder; others the oil; and others the wine. It is obvious that, in many cases, the uterine efforts would return in the period which would necessarily elapse in the administration of ergot; so that several of the cases, at least, of reputed efficacy, may not have been dependent upon the assigned agent. Ergot also possesses, it is affirmed, narcotic virtues, which have rendered it useful in hemorrhagic and other affections of excitement.

Bread, made of spurred rye, has been attended with the effects described under Ergotism.

Boerhaave admitted several orders of capillary vessels, the diameters of which went on decreasing. The largest received red blood, those which came next received only white, others only lymph, whilst the last of all were destined for yet more subtile fluids—for a kind of vapour. When the red globules entered vessels destined for the white, or the white those intended for the thinner fluids, there was, according to the theory of Boerhaave, an error loci, the proximate cause of inflammation and other mischiefs. See Aberration.

It is a vegetable powder, which, when, mixed with milk and soup and taken night and morning, is said to have succeeded in removing old and obstinate obstructions! Buchner thinks it is bean-meal, Ditterich, the meal of the seed of Ervum Ervilia.

A specimen of Warton's Ervalent'a, obtained at the depôt, and analyzed by Dr. Hassall, was found to contain a mixture of the French and German lentil, reduced to powder, including portions of the shells or husks, and of a substance very closely resembling, in its microscopic characters, corn meal. A sample of Du Barry's Revalen'ta Arab'ica was found to consist of a mixture of the Egyp'tian or Ara'bian len'til and bar'ley meal.

Superficial inflammation of the skin, with general fever, tension and swelling of the part; pain and heat more or less acrid; redness diffused, but more or less circumscribed, and disappearing when pressed upon by the finger, but returning as soon as the pressure is removed. Frequently, small vesicles appear upon the inflamed part, which dry up and fall off, under the form of branny scales. Erysipelas is, generally, an acute affection: its medium duration being from 10 to 14 days. It yields, commonly, to general refrigerant remedies. Topical applications are rarely serviceable. At times, when the disease approaches the phlegmonous character, copious bleeding and other evacuants may be required, as in many cases of erysipelas of the face; but this is not commonly necessary. In most cases, indeed, the general action seems deficient, and it becomes necessary to give tonics.

When erysipelas is of a highly inflammatory character, and invades the parts beneath, it is termed Erysip'elas phlegmono'des, (F.) Érysipèle phlegmoneux: when accompanied with phlyctenæ, and the inflammation terminates in gangrene, Erysip'elas gangræno'sum, (F.) Érysipèle gangréneux; and when associated with infiltration of serum, Erysip'elas œdamato'sum, (F.) Érysipéle œdamateux.

It forms the 6th genus of the 3d order, Exanthemata, of Bateman's classification of cutaneous diseases; and is defined, 'a nearly continuous redness of some portion of the skin, attended with disorder of the constitution, but not contagious.' Many varieties are described by dermatologists,—for example, E. intertri'go, E. fu'gax, E. papula'tum, E. tubercula'tum, E. nodosum, E. læ'vē, E. centrif'ugum, E. margina'tum, and E. acrodyn'ia.

EXCITA'TION, Excita'tio, Excitement. The act of exciting; the state of an organ or organs excited. Excitement is, sometimes, used synonymously with augmented arterial action. The effect of the exciting powers acting on the excitability, according to Brown, constitutes excitement. Cullen used the term to express the restoration of the energy and action of the brain, which had been interrupted by sleep or some debilitating cause,—a state opposite to that of collapse. Not unfrequently, it is employed in the sense of excessive action, — Superexcita'tio, (F.) Sur-excitation.

EXCI'TO or EX'CITO-MO'TORY, (F.) Excito-moteur. An epithet applied by Dr. Marshall Hall to a division of the nervous system — comprising the gray matter of the spinal marrow, with the afferent and efferent nerves connected with it; — all of which are concerned in reflex actions; or those by which impressions are transmitted to a centre, and reflected so as to produce muscular contraction without sensation or volition. They constitute the re'flex sys'tem of nerves. See Nerves.

The term excito-motion has also been employed to signify motion, no matter how excited, by the reflex nerves or by volition.

Excitonu'trient and Excitosecre'tory are reflex actions in which nutrition and secretion are modified in parts by impressions made elsewhere and reflected to them, as where tumours disappear or secretions of tears, milk, saliva, for example, are increased, by impressions made on the cerebro-spinal nervous centres.

An Excretory vessel or duct, Ductus excreto'rius, is one which transmits the fluid secreted by a gland either externally or into the reservoirs into which it has to be deposited. The existence of an excretory duct was regarded as a distinctive character of the glands properly so called.

The chief active exercises are:—walking, running, dancing, hunting, fencing, playing at ball, cricket, racket, quoits, swimming, declamation, and singing. Exercise is an important prophylactic, particularly for those disposed to be plethoric. By this is meant the separation of the dead portions of a bone, tendon, aponeurosis, or cartilage, under the form of lamellæ or small scales. Exfoliation is accomplished by the instinctive action of the parts, and its object is to detach the dead portion from those subjacent, which are still alive. For this purpose the latter throw out fleshy granulations, and a more or less abundant suppuration occurs, which tends to separate the exfoliated part—now become an extraneous body. The ancients distinguished exfoliation into sensible and insensible, according as the dead portions of bone were detached in fragments of greater or less size, or in very thin pieces, and in an almost insensible manner. When the dead part embraces all or almost all the substance of a bone, it takes the name Sequestrum.

EXFO'LIATIVE, Exfoliati'vus, Desquamato'rius, (F.) Exfoliatif. That which takes away by leaves or scales. The term has been applied to certain medicines, which were regarded as proper to hasten exfoliation, such as alcohol, oil of turpentine, tincture of myrrh, &c.

Exhalant Ves'sels, Va'sa exhalan'tia, are very minute, and rise from the arterial capillary system. They are situate in every tissue of the body, and on the surface of the mucous and serous membranes and skin; on which each pours its particular fluid. Bichat distinguished three sets. 1. The external, terminating on the mucous and external dermoid system, where they pour the matter of perspiration. 2. The internal, comprising those of the areolar and medullary tissues, and of synovial surfaces; and, 3. The nutritive exhalants, which vary in each organ where they are found, and preside over the phenomena of composition and increase of every part of the body. The exhalants are the antagonists of the absorbents. They are imaginary, as a distinct set from the capillary vessels.

EXHALATIO, Evaporation, Exhalation.

EXHALA'TION, Exhala'tio; (same etymon as Exhalant,) Anathymi'asis, Apopnen'sis, (F.) Exhalaison. A function, by virtue of which certain fluids, obtained from the blood, are spread, in the form of dew, in the areolæ of the different textures, or at the surface of membranes; either for the sake of being thrown out of the body, or to serve ulterior purposes. The sweat is a liquid excrementitious exhalation; the serous fluid of the pleura, a liquid recrementitious exhalation.

Exhalation is also applied to that which exhales from any body whatever, organic or inorganic, dead or living.

Judicial investigations relative to the body of the person inhumed. 2. The removal of a body from one cemetery to another; and, 3. The evacuation of cemeteries or sepulchral vaults. The operation is attended with much unpleasant smell and annoyance, and requires the use of disinfecting agents, of which one of the most available is chlorinated lime. See Disinfection. The putrid effluvia from animal substances are not, however, found to excite endemic disease.

In adults, it occurs more commonly in females than in males; and, when it does so, the sac passes in the vicinity of the umbilicus. The organs found in this kind of hernia are particularly—the epiploon, the jejunum, the arch of the colon, and sometimes the stomach. The tumour is, in general, round, and presents all the characters of hernia. It is, commonly, readily reducible, and not subject to strangulation. In exophthalmia, the eye is pressed forwards; the eyelids are raised and separated, so that they can no longer cover the eye and defend it from the action of extraneous bodies; it becomes inflamed, and the sight is disturbed or destroyed. The treatment of course depends upon the cause. An anæmic condition, accompanied by protrusion of the eyeballs, palpitation of the heart and arteries, and tumefaction of the thyroid gland, has been described under the names Cachex'ia exophthal'mica, Exophthal'mic goitre, Maladie de Basedow, and Anæmic protrusion of the eye-balls, (F.) Cachexie exophthalmique.

EXPECTA'TION, Expecta'tio. The word expectation has been applied, in medicine, to that method, which consists in observing the progress of diseases, and removing deranging influences, without prescribing active medicines, unless such shall be imperiously required. It consists, in fact, in leaving the disease almost wholly to the efforts of nature, and has been termed the art of curing diseases by expectation or waiting, Ars sanan'di cum expectatio'nē.

The following are the chief reputed expectorants:—Ammoniacum; Asafœtida; Galbanum; Ipecacuanha,; Myroxylon; Myrrha; Inhalations of Iodine, Stramonium, Tar, Burning Wool, Tobacco, &c.; Scilla; Senega, and Tolutanum.

In medicine, this knowledge can be obtained both by the practitioner's own experience, and by that obtained from tradition and from books. To profit by experience requires a mind capable of appreciating the proper relations between cause and effect; and hence it happens, that false experience, Experien'tia fal'lax, is extremely common; and that a man had better, in many instances, trust to that which he has learned from others, than to his own fallacious observation.

The union of accurate observation by the physician with that handed down by medical writers constitutes perfect experience, so far as it is attainable in any individual case.

EXTRAC'TIO, Extraction, Extractum.

EXTRAC'TION, Extrac'tio, Exæ'resis, Exel'cē, Exelcys'mus, Enchylo'sis. The act of removing an extraneous substance from any part of the body. Thus, a splinter is said to be extracted. It is also applied to the removal of certain parts. The cataract is said to be extracted; a tooth is extracted, when carious, &c.

EXTRAC'TIVE, (F.) Extractif. A peculiar, presumed principle, which has been admitted in extracts. Thus, bitter extractive is the immediate principle of bitter vegetables, &c. The term is, also, applied to ill defined animal matters met with on analysis.

EXTRACTIVE, OXIDIZED, Apothème.

EXTRACTS, see Extractum — e. Fluid, see Extractum.

EXTRAC'TUM, Ecchylo'ma, Extrac'tio, Ex'tract, (F.) Extrait, Apostolé. An extract is prepared by evaporating vegetable solutions, till a tenacious mass is obtained. When prepared from an infusion or decoction, it is called a watery;

from ether, an ethereal; and from alcohol, an alcohol'ic or a spiritous extract. Both kinds contain all the principles of the vegetable that are soluble in the menstrua with which they are prepared; but the volatile parts are dissipated, and some of the fixed parts are decomposed; the proper extractive is oxygenized, and the virtues of the vegetable substance are altered or destroyed. Extracts are hard, soft, or fluid: the consistence of the soft being such as to retain the pilular form without the addition of a powder. A patent was taken out, many years ago, by a Mr. Barry, of London, for preparing them in vacuo; and, as the temperature is much lower than in the ordinary method, the virtues of the plant are less altered, and the extracts are generally green. Extracts are also prepared by displacement or percolation. They have, likewise, received different names, according to their predominant principle. The gum'my or mu'cous, or mucilag''inous, are those which are mainly composed of gum or mucilage. Gum tragacanth may be considered a pure gummy extract. Gelat'inous extracts are those composed especially of gelatin; res'inous extracts, those of a resinous character; extrac'tores'inous, those composed of extractive or colouring matter and resin; gumres'inous, those containing gum and resin; and sapona'ceous or sapona'ceous saline', those containing a notable quantity of saline substances and a resinous matter, so combined with mucus and other soluble substances, that they cannot be separated. Under the name Flu'id Ex'tracts — Extracta Flui'da seu Liq'uida—a class of preparations has been introduced into the Pharmacopœias, the distinctive character of which is, the concentration of the active ingredients of medicinal substances into a small bulk, in the liquid form.

When the last portion of this has penetrated the aconite, pour in from time to time water sufficient to keep the powder covered. Stop the filtration when the liquid which passes begins to produce a precipitate, as it falls, in that which has already passed. Distil off the alcohol, and evaporate to a proper consistence.— Ph. U. FACE, Fa'cies, Vul'tus, Vol'tus, Proso'pon, Sto'ma, (F.) Face, (facere, 'to make or form.') The face is the anterior part of the head. It is formed of 13 bones, — the two superior maxillary, the two malar, the two ossa nasi, the two ossa unguis, the vomer, the two ossa spongiosa inferiora, the two palate bones, and the inferior maxillary, without including the frontal portion of the os frontis, and the 32 teeth, which may be considered to form part of it. Its numerous muscles are chiefly destined for the organs of sight, hearing, taste, and smell. Its arteries proceed from the external carotid: its veins end in the jugular, and its nerves draw their origin immediately from the brain.

The face experiences alterations in disease, which it is important to attend to. It is yellow in jaundice; pale and puffy in dropsy; and its expression is very different according to the seat of irritation, so that, in infants, by an attention to medical physiognomy, we can often detect the seat of disease. Hippocrates has well depicted the change which it experiences in one exhausted by long sickness, by great evacuations, excessive hunger, watchfulness, &c., threatening dissolution. Hence this state has been called Facies Hippocrat'ica, Facies Cadaver'ica, F. Tortua'lis. In this, the nose is pinched; the eyes are sunk; the temples hollow; the ears cold, and retracted; the skin of the forehead tense, and dry; the complexion livid; the lips pendent, relaxed, and cold, &c.

The term Face (F.) is likewise given to one of the aspects of an organ; thus, we say, the superior face of the stomach.

FACE AGUE, Neuralgia, facial.

FACE INJECTÉE, see Vultueux—f. Vultueuse, see Vultueux.

FAC''ET, (F.) Facette, (dim. of Face.) Facie'cula. A small face. A small, circumscribed portion of the surface of a bone, as the articula. facette of a bone.

FACHINGEN, MIN'ERAL WA'TERS OF. These springs are at no great distance from those of Geilenau, and two miles north of Wisbaden. They contain free carbonic acid; carbonate, sulphate, and phosphate of soda; chloride of sodium, carbonate of lime, magnesia, and iron.

FA'CIAL, Facia'lis, (from facies.) Belonging to, or connected with, the face. See Facial vein.

Facial Angle, see Angle, facial.

Facial Ar'tery, La'bial ar'tery, An'gular or exter'nal max'illary ar'tery, A. paluto-labial — (Ch.), is a branch of the external carotid, which rises beneath the digastricus, and is distributed to almost every part of the face. It furnishes the inferior palatal, submental, superior labial, inferior labial, and dorsalis nasi. Chaussier calls the external carotid artery, Facial Artery.

Facial Line, see Angle, facial.

Facial Nerve, Ra'mus du'rior sep'timæ conjugatio'nis, Sympathet'icus mi'nor, Par sep'timum seu facia'lē, Commu'nicans fa'ciei ner'vus, Por'tio du'ra of the 7th pair, Res'piratory nerve of the face. This nerve arises from the inferior and lateral part of the tuber annulare, in the groove which separates it from the medulla oblongata, external to the corpora olivaria, and by the side of the auditory nerve. It issues from the cranium by the meatus auditorius internus; enters the aqueduct of Fallopius; receives a branch of the Vidian nerve; forms a gangliform swelling—Intumescen'tia gangliform'is; — sends off filaments to the internal muscles of the malleus and stapes: furnishes, according to many anatomists, that called Chorda Tympani; makes its exit at the foramen stylo-mastoideum, and divides into two branches—the temporo-facial, and cervico-facial. On the face it is termed Pes anseri'nus, Plexus nervo'rum anseri'nus. See Portio Wrisbergii.

FACIAL VEIN, Pal'ato-labial—(Ch.), arises between the skin and frontalis muscle, and bears the name Ve'na Fronta'lis, V. Præpara'ta, (F.) Veine frontale ou V. Prépurate. It then descends, vertically, towards the greater angle of the eye, where it is called Angula'ris; and afterwards descends, obliquely, on the face, to open into the internal jugular, after having received branches, which correspond with those of the facial artery. It is only in the latter part of its course that it is called Facial Vein.

FACIECULA, (dim. of Facies,) Facet.

FA'CIENT, (faciens, 'making,' facio, 'I make.') A suffix, as in Calefacient, Rubefacient, &c., 'warm making,' 'red making.'

FACIES, Face—f. Cadaverica, see Face—f. Concava pedis, Sole—f. Hippocratica, see Face—f. Inferior pedis, Sole—f. Tortualis, see Face.

FACTICE, Factitious.

FACTIT''IOUS, Factit''ius, (F.) Factice, (facere, factum, 'to make.') Artificial. That which is made by art, in opposition to what is natural, or found already existing in nature. Thus, we say, factitious mineral waters for artificial mineral waters.

FACULTAS, Faculty—f. Auctrix, Plastic force—f. Formatrix, Plastic force—f. Nutrix, Plastic force—f. Vegetativa, Plastic force—f. Zotica, Vis vitalis.

The power of executing any function or act. The collection of the intellectual faculties constitutes the understanding. We say, also, vital faculties, for vital properties, &c. Faculty likewise means the whole body of the medical profession, and, also, a body of medical or other professors.

FÆCAL, (from fæces,) Stercoraceous—f. Retention, Constipation.

They are called, also, Espéces Vulnéraires, and Thé Suisse. Within the present century, in England, a kind of vulnerary beer was often prescribed, in country practice, in all cases of inward bruises. It bore the name Cervisi'ia ni'gra, or black beer, and was formed by infusing certain reputed vulnerary herbs in beer or ale.

The infusion of the Falltranck is aromatic, and slightly agreeable, but of no use in the cases for which it has been particularly recommended.

FALSIFICA'TION, Adultera'tio, (falsus, 'false,' and facere, 'to make.') A fraudulent imitation or alteration of an aliment or medicine by different admixtures. It is synonymous with adultera'tion and sophistica'tion. By Dr. Hassall, the practice of adulteration is defined as the intentional addition to an article, for purposes of gain or deception, of any substance or substances, the presence of which is not acknowledged in the name under which the article is sold.

The following table was prepared to indicate common falsifications practised with some of the most useful drugs. Of late years, increased attention has been drawn to the alarming extent to which the adulterations of both drugs and aliments have been carried. The object has been seriously examined and reported on by a committee of the British House of Commons, and two elaborate works have been published by Dr. Hassall,—the one "On Food and its Adulterations," (1855); and the other entitled "Adulterations Detected," (1857), both in food and medicines, comprising the Reports of the Analytical Sanitary Commission of "the Lancet," &c. &c., (1857.) The principal means for the detection of such adulterations are afforded by chemistry and the microscope. The former has always been employed for the purpose; but the latter only recently. It is especially adapted for the detection of animal and vegetable admixtures, on the presence of which chemistry can shed little or no light. Th distinctive characters of many of the pure arti cles employed in medicine are given in the Pharmacopœias, as in that of the United States (1863.)

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Mode of Detection.
Acaciæ Gummi. Gum Arabic.	Gum Senegal	Gum Senegal is clammy and tenacious. Gum Arabic is perfectly soluble in water, and its solution limpid.
Acetum Destillatum. Distilled Vinegar.	Sulphuric Acid	Acetate of barytes causes a white precipitate.
	Nitric Acid	By evaporating it, the residuum deflagrates, when thrown on burning charcoal.
	Copper	Supersatnrate with ammonia—a blue colour is produced.
	Lead	Sulphuretted hydrogen causes a dark precipitate.
Acidum Arseniosum. Arsenious Acid.	Chalk, Sulphate of Lime, Sulphate of Baryta.	Not volatizable by heat.
Acidum Citricum. Citric Acid.	Tartaric and Oxalic Acids	Their presence is indicated by forming a granular sediment in a concentrated solution of a neutral salt of potassa.
Acidum Muriaticum. Muriatic Acid.	Sulphuric Acid	Deposits by evaporation the salts it may contain; precipitates with solution of hydrochlorate of baryta if it contains sulphuric acid.
Acidum Nitricum. Nitric Acid.	Muriatic and Sulphuric Acids.	The presence of chlorine is indicated by a precipitate with nitrate of silver: that of sulphuric acid by the same result with hydrochlorate of baryta.
Acidum Sulphuricum. Sulphuric Acid.	Muriatic and Nitric Acids	The presence of muriatic and nitric acid is indicated by the smell, when the acid tested is strongly heated.
Æther Rectificatus. Rectified Ether.	Too dilute.	The s. g. detects this.
	Sulphuric Acid	By acetate of baryta. Precipitate white.
	Alcohol	With phosphorus a milky instead of limpid solution is formed.
Ammoniæ Aqua. Water of Ammonia. Ammoniæ Carbonas. Carbonate of Ammonia.	Carbonic Acid	A precipitation occurs on adding a solution of muriate of lime. It should be capable of complete volatilization by heat.
Ammoniacum Ammoniac.		The Guttæ Ammoniaci are white, clear, and dry. The lump Ammoniacum, lapis Ammoniaci, is often adulterated with common resin.
Antimonii Sulphuretum. Sulphuret of Antimony.		It ought to be entirely volatilized by a red heat.
	Lead.	Imparts a foliated texture, and is not vaporizable.
	Arsenic	A smell of garlic is emitted when thrown on live coals
	Manganese and Iron.	Are not vaporizable.

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Mode of Detection.
Argenti Nitras Nitrate of Silver.	Copper	The solution assumes a blue colour, when supersaturated with ammonia. It may be suspected when the salt deliquesces.
	Nitrate of Potassa	The adulteration with nitrate of potassa is easily recognized by the fracture of a stick of it, which is radiated when pure, and granular if adulterated; or by precipitating a solution of the salts with a sufficient quantity of muriatic acid, and evaporating the clear liquor: the nitrate of potassa or other salts will remain.
Balsamum Peruvianum. Balsam of Peru.	A mixture of Resin and some Volatile Oil, with Benzoin.	Not easily detected.
Calumba. Columbo.	A menisperm from Ceylon, tinged Bryony root, and the root of Frasera Walteri.	The true is distinguishable from the false Columbo by adding to an infusion of the root, a few drops of solution of sulph. iron, which gives to the infusion of the false Columbo a greenish black colour; but produces no change in the other.
Capsicum. Cayenne Pepper.	Chloride of Sodium	This disposes it to deliquesce.
	Red Lead	Digest in acetic acid, and add a solution of sulphuret of ammonia—a dark-coloured precipitate will be produced.
Castoreum. Castor.	A mixture of dried blood, gum ammoniac. and a little real castor. stuffed into the scrotum of a goat.	Smell and taste will generally detect the fraud.
Cera Alba. White Wax.	White Lead	Melt the wax, the oxide will subside.
	Tallow	The cake has not its ordinary translucency.
Cera Flava. Yellow Wax.	Earth or Peasmeal	May be suspected when the cake is brittle and colour grayish.
	Resin	Put it in cold alcohol, which will dissolve the resin, without acting on the wax.
	Tallow	Is known by the greater softness and unctuosity, and its smell when melted. Turmeric is generally added in this case to obviate the paleness.
Cinchona. Bark.	This is variously adulterated, but generally with the Carthagena and other inferior barks.	Can only be detected by practice, and examining into the quantity of quinia, or cinchonia, or both, which it contains.
Coccus. Cochineal.	Pieces of dough formed in moulds, and coloured with cochineal.	Throw it into water, the adulteration will appear.
Copaiba. Balsam of Copaiva.	Fixed Oils.	If it does not retain its spherical form when dropped into water, its adulteration may be inferred. Mix one part of strong liquid ammonia of 22°, with three parts of copaiba. If pure, the mixture will, in a few minutes, become transparent; if not, it will remain opake.
Crocus. Saffron.	Fibres of smoked Beef	Affords an unpleasant odour when thrown on live coals.
	Petals of Calendula officinalis, and Carthamus Tinctorius.	Infuse the specimen in hot water, and the difference will be perceptible.
Cubeba. Cubebs.	Turkey Yellow Berries, or the dried fruit of Rhamnus Catharticus.	Detected by attentive examination.
Cusparia Cortex. Angustura or Cusparia Bark.	False Angustura sometimes sold for it.	The epidermis of the true Cusparia is characterized by being covered with a matter resembling the rust of iron. False cusparia bark yields brucia and strychnia; the true yields neither.
Guaiaca Resina. Resin of Guaiacum.	Common Resin	Detected by the turpentine smell emitted when thrown upon hot coals.
	Manchineel Gum	Add to the tincture a few drops of the spirit of nitre, and dilute with water; the guaiacum is precipitated—the adulteration floats in white striæ.
Hydrargyri Chloridum Mite. Calomel.	Corrosive Sublimate and Subnitrate of Bismuth.	A precipitation will be produced by the carbonate of potassa. from a solution made by boiling the suspected sample with a small portion of muriate of ammonia in distilled water; or, the presence of deutochloride of mercury is indicated by warming gently a small quantity of calomel in alcohol, filtering and adding to the clear liquor some limewater, by which a reddish yellow precipitate is afforded. When calomel is rubbed with a fixed alkali, it ought to become intensely black, and not exhibit any orange hue.
	Carbonate of Lead, Sulphate of Baryta, and Carbonate of Baryta.	Not volatilized by heat,—the carbonates effervesce with acids.
Hydrargyri Oxidum Rubrum. Red Oxide of Mercury.	Red Lead, Red Oxide of Iron, Brick Dust.	Digest in acetic acid: add sulphuret of ammonia, which will produce a dark coloured precipitate. It should be totally volatilized by heat.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Nigrum.	Ivory Black	Throw a suspected portion on hot coals—the residuum will detect the fraud.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Rubrum. Red Sulphuret of Mercury.	Red Lead, Red Oxide of Iron, Brick Dust.	Digest in acetic acid, and add sulphuret of ammonia—a black precipitate will be produced. Does not wholly sublime like the genuine article.
Iodinium. Iodine.	Plumbago, Charcoal, and Oxide of Manganese.	The tests of its purity are—that it is freely soluble in ether and alcohol. Heated on a piece of glass or porcelain, it sublimes without residuum, rising in purple vapour. With starch in cold solution it produces a blue colour.
Jalapæ Radix. Jalap Root.	Bryony Root, spurious or false Jalap Root, and Liquorice Root.	Bryony root is of a paler colour, and less compact texture, and does not easily burn at the flame of a candle. Liquorice is detected by the taste.

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Modes of Detection.
Magnesia.	Lime	Detected by the solution in dilute sulphuric acid affording a precipitate with oxalate of ammonia.
	Sulphuret of Lime	Gives off, when moistened, the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen.
Magnesiæ Carbonas. Carbonate of Magnesia.	Chalk	Detected by adding dilute sulphuric acid to the suspected substance, when, if chalk be present, there will be a white insoluble precipitate.
	Gypsum	Boil in distilled water, and test the solution by a barytic and oxalic reagent.
Manna.	A factitious article, consisting of honey or sugar, mixed with scammony, is said to be sometimes sold for it.	The colour, weight, transparency, and taste detect it.
Morphia et ejus Sales. Morphia, and its Salts.		Morphia and its salts, when placed in contact with nitric acid, are coloured red; with persalts of iron, blue. They are perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and acidulated warm water. When morphia is mixed with narcotina, the adulteration is ascertained by mixing them with sulphuric ether, which dissolves the narcotina, without sensibly affecting the morphia.
Moschus. Musk.	Dried Blood	The bag must not appear to have been opened. This may be suspected, if it emits a fetid smoke when inflamed.
	Asphaltum	Discovered by its melting and running before it inflames.
	Fine particles of Lead	Rub with water. The metallic particles will subside.
Olea Destillata. Essential Oils.	Fixed Oils	Touch writing paper with it, and hold it before the fire: fixed oil leaves a stain of grease.
	Alcohol	Add water; a milkiness and increase of temperature occurs.
Oleum Ricini. Castor Oil.	Olive or Almond or Poppy Oil.	Alcohol S. g. .820 will mix with any proportion of castor oil, whilst it dissolves very little of the others.
Opium.	Extract of Liquorice, Bullets and Stones sometimes; Extract of Poppy, of Chelidonium majus, and other vegetables. Molasses, G. Arabic, G. Tragacanth, Linseed Oil, Cow's Dung.	The best opium is covered with leaves and the reddish capsules of a species of Rumex. The inferior kinds have capsules adherent. It is bad when soft and friable, when intensely black or mixed with many impurities, and when sweet. The quantity of morphia affords the best test.
Potassii Iodidum. Iodide of Potassium.	Chlorides of Potassium, and Sodium, Nitrate and Carbonate of Potassa.	The adulteration is ascertained by precipitating a solution of the salt with nitrate of silver, and treating the precipitate with ammonia, which dissolves the chloride of silver, without acting upon the iodide of this metal.
Quiniæ Sulphas. Sulphate of Quinia.	Mannite, Sugar of Milk, Starch, Chalk.	The genuine salt leaves no residue when submitted to calcination; is perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and in water slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid.
Strychniæ et ejus Sales. Strychnia and its Salts.	Brucia	By the red color produced by contact with nitric acid.
Zinci Oxydum. Oxide of Zinc.	Chalk and Carbonate of Magnesia.	Sulphuric acid excites an effervescence.
	White Lead	Sulphuric acid forms an insoluble sulphate of lead.

Its base is attached to the middle of the tentorium, and its top or apex bifurcates, to proceed to the sides of the foramen magnum. Its convex surface is towards the cranium, and its concave in the fissure or groove, which separates the two lobes of the cerebellum.

FALX CER'EBRI, F. ma'jor, Ver'tical superior longitu'dinal proc''ess, Mediasti'num cer'ebri, Sep'tum Cer'ebri, Proces'sus falciform'is duræ matris, (F.) Faux du cerveau, Repli longitudinal de la méninge, (Ch.) The greatest process of the dura mater. It extends from the foro to the hind part of the skull, on the median line; is broad behind and narrow before, and is lodged in the groove which separates the hemispheres from each other —the interlob'ular fis'sure. At its superior part is situated the longitudinal sinus (superior), and at its lower, corresponding to the edge of the scythe, the inferior longitudinal sinus. Its anterior extremity is attached to the crista galli; its posterior is continuous with the tentorium cerebelli, and contains the straight sinus.

It is attached, externally, to the inner edge of the crest of the ilium, below and anteriorly,—on one side to the crural arch, sending an expansion to the fascia transversalis; and on the other, continuous with the deep-seated lamina of the fascia lata, which forms the posterior paries of the crural canal. Within and behind, the fascia iliaca is attached to the brim of the pelvis, and is continuous with the aponeurosis, which M. Jules Cloquet has called Pel'vian. The iliac aponeurosis covers the iliac and psoas muscles, which it separates from the peritoneum.

Fascia Infundib'uliformis, is a funnel-shaped offset from the fascia transversalis, which is prolonged as a sheath upon the vas deferens and spermatic vessels as they pass out of the abdomen.

Fascia La'ta. A name given by anatomists to an aponeurosis, and to a muscle.

Fascia Lata Aponeuro'sis, F. aponeurot'ica fem'oris, Vagi'na fem'oris, Cru'ral or Fem'oral Aponeuro'sis, is the most extensive in the body, and envelopes all the muscles of the thigh. Above, it is attached to the outer edge of the ilia; before, it arises from the crural arch by two distinct laminæ, separated by the femoral vessels, and becoming confounded a little below the part where the great vena saphæna opens into the crural vein. Of these two laminæ, the one is more anterior and thicker than the other, and may be considered as a prolongation of the aponeurosis of the external oblique: it is intimately united to Poupart's ligament. The other, which is thinner, is behind, and deeper seated, and, after its union with the former, proceeds to be inserted into the pubis. Inferiorly, the fascia lata becomes confounded with the tendon of the triceps, and is attached to the external tuberosity of the tibia. The use of the fascia lata, like that of other aponeuroses, is to strengthen the action of the muscles, &c.

Fascia La'ta Muscle, Ten'sor vagi'næ fem'oris, Fascia'lis, Membrano'sus, Mus'culus aponeuro'sis seu fas'ciæ la'tæ seu fem'oris membrano'sus, (F.) Ilio-aponévrosi-fémoral, Ilio-aponévroti-fémoral—(Ch.) Tenseur de l'aponévrose fémorale. A muscle, situate at the upper and outer part of the thigh. It arises, above, from the outer part of the anterior and superior spine of the ilium; and is inserted, below, between the two laminæ of the fascia lata, which it stretches and raises when it contracts.

Fascia Superficia'lis, Superfic''ial aponeuro'sis of the abdo'men and thigh, (F.) Aponévrose superficielle de l'abdomen et de la cuisse. A very thin aponeurosis, which covers the muscles and aponeuroses of the abdomen; passes before the crural arch, to which it adheres with some degree of force; sends a membranous sheath, which surrounds the spermatic cord, and is continuous with the dartos, which it assists in forming. The fascia superficialis presents, beneath the crural arch, very distinct fibres, whose direction is parallel to the fold of the thigh. It is applied over the fascia lata aponeurosis, and is attached, internally, to the ascending ramus of the ischium, near the root of the corpus cavernosum. Before the descent of the testicle from the abdomen, the fascia super-ficialis is very manifestly continuous with the Gubernaculum testis.

Fascia Tfonmis, T. bandage—f. Tortilis, Tourniquet.

Fascia Transversa'lis, F. Cooperi. An aponeurosis, which separates the transversalis muscle from the peritoneum in the inguinal region. It arises above the posterior edge of the crural arch, where it seems to be continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle. Above, it is lost in the areolar tissue at the internal surface of the transversalis abdominis. Within, it is continuous with the outer edge of the tendon of the rectus muscle and Gimbernat's ligament; below, it is continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique, and receives an expansion from the Fascia Iliaca. Towards its middle and a little above the crural arch, the fascia transversalis has the wide orifice of a canal, which is occupied, in the female, by the round ligament of the uterus; and in man, furnishes an expansion, that serves as a sheath to the spermatic vessels.

FAT, (G. fett, Sax. fæt,) Pingue'do, Pim'elē, Pi'ar, Li'pē, Li'pos, Ste'ar, A'deps, Se'vum, Se'bum, Cor'pus adipo'sum, Axun'gia, (F.) Graisse. A soft, white, animal substance; inodorous; insipid; oily; inflammable; easy to melt; spoiling in the air, and becoming rancid by union with oxygen; almost insoluble in alcohol; insoluble in water; soluble in fixed oils. Fat is formed of the immediate principles, stearin, margarin, and olein or elain, all of which are regarded as salts composed of stearic, margaric and oleic acids, and a common base, to which, from its sweetish taste, the name Glyc''erin, Glyceri'na, Glyceri'num. (F.) Glycérine has been given. To these are, almost always, joined an odorous and a colouring principle. Glycerin, Glyceri'na, was introduced into the edition of the Pharmacopœia of the U. S. (1851), in which it was directed to be prepared as follows:—Lead plaster, recently prepared and yet fluid, and boiling water, of each a gallon; mix; stir briskly for 15 minutes; allow it to cool, and pour off the liquid. Evaporate until it has the s. g. 1.15, and pass slowly through it a current of sulphohydric acid until a black precipitate is no longer thrown down. Filter and boil until the sulphohydric acid is driven off, and evaporate the liquid until it ceases to lose weight.

In the last edition of the Pharmacopœia (1863), it has been transferred to the primary list of the Materia Medica.

Glycerin is a colourless or straw-coloured syrupy fluid; s. g. 1.25. It is soluble in water and in alcohol, but not in ether. It is used in the form of lotion, composed of half an ounce to ten fluidounces of water, in cutaneous diseases, as psoriasis, pityriasis, lepra, and ichthyosis. It keeps the part moist, as it does not evaporate readily. A Glycerin oint'ment may be made of Spermaceti ℥ss; White wax ℥j; Oil of almonds f℥ij; Glycerin f℥j. Melt the spermaceti and wax with the oil, and incorporate the glycerin in a mortar. It may be used wherever a mild ointment is demanded.

Fat is found in a number of animal tissues, and is very abundant in the neighbourhood of the kidneys and in the epiploon. It is generally fluid in the cetacea; soft, and of a strong smell in the carnivora; solid, and inodorous in the ruminating animal; white, and abundant in young animals; and yellowish in old. It generally forms about a twentieth part of the weight of the human body. The fat, considered physiologically, has, for its function, to protect the organs; maintain their temperature; and to serve for nutrition in case of need; as is observed in torpid animals.

The cellular membrane has been called fatty or ad'ipous; from an opinion that, in its areolæ, the fat is deposited. The areolar membrane, however, merely lodges, between its lamellæ and filaments, the vesicles in which the fat is contained.

Fatty Mem'brane, Ad'ipous mem'brane, Adipous tis'sue. The subcutaneous areolar tissue, or that containing the fatty or adipose vesicles.

Fatty Ves'icles, Sac'culi adipo'si, Ad'ipous ves'icles, Fat cells. This name is given to small bursæ or membranous vesicles which enclose the fat, and are found situate in the areolæ of the areolar tissue. These vesicles vary much in size. Generally, they are round and globular; and, in certain subjects, receive vessels which are very apparent. They form so many small sacs without apertures, in the interior of which are filaments arranged like septa. In fatty subjects, the adipous vesicles are very perceptible, being attached to the areolar tissue and neighbouring parts by a vascular pedicle. Raspail affirms that there is the most striking analogy between the nature of the adipose granules and that of the amylaceous grains.

FÉGARITE, Cancer aquaticus, Stomatitis, pseudo-membranous.

FEIGN'ED DISEASES, Mor'bi dissimula'ti seu simula'ti seu ccla'ti seu infitia'ti seu pseudo'lei, Simulated or Pretend'ed diseases, (F.) Maladies dissimulées ou simulées ou feintes ou supposées. The tricks employed, by impostors, to induce a belief that they are attacked with diseases when they are not. These are generally assumed by beggars to obtain alms; by criminals to escape punishment; and by soldiers to be exempt from duty.

The following table exhibits the chief feigned, pretended, simulated or excited diseases, or disqualifications, with the means of detection:—

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Abortion.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.
Abstinence.	.....	By constant and minute attention.
Amaurotic Blindness.	By applying the extract of belladonna or datura stramonium to the eye.	Amaurosis is characterized by dilated pupil. Where these substances have been applied, the effects will go off in ten days or a fortnight.
Aphonia.	.....	By anæsthetics, and, under their use, or otherwise, taking the person off his guard.
Apoplexy.	By falling down as if deprived of sensation and consciousness.	By powerful stimulants; an electric shock; application of hot water, sternutatories, actual cautery, &c.
Cachexia, Anæmia, and Debility.	Using substances to make the face appear pale and livid. Indulging freely in wine, and privation of sleep prior to examination.	By examining if the pulse be strong, and the skin hot, and whether there be loss of appetite or of strength, or swelling of the limbs, or unmistakable feebleness of the vital actions.
Calculi, Excretion of.	Putting sand, pebbles, &c. into the urine.	By the aid of chymistry. We are acquainted with the chymical composition of urinary calculi.
Cancerous Ulcer.	By gluing on a portion of a spleen with the smooth side to the skin, leaving on the outside the appearance of an ulcerated surface.	By noticing whether there be signs of cachexia, and by attentive examination of the part.
Catalepsy	By seeming to be suddenly motionless, the joints remaining flexible, and external objects making no impression.	By powerful stimulants, as recommended under apoplexy. Letting fall a drop of boiling water on the back. Proposing to use the actual cautery, and seeing whether the pulse rises.
Chorea.	By assuming the convulsive motions of a part which characterize chorea.	By examining the patient whilst he may imagine himself unobserved, and seeing whether the convulsive motions go on. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Contraction of Joints in General.	.....	Mode of discrimination sometimes so obscure as to deceive the most practised and attentive. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Contraction of the Fingers.	.....	Introduce a cord between the fingers and the palm of the hand, and gradually apply weights so as to expand the fingers. Confine him so that he cannot obtain his food without using his clenched hand. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Convulsions.	.....	When feigned, they do not present the rigidity of muscles or the rapidity of action which characterize the real. The mode of detection must be the same as in epilepsy.
Cornea, Opake.	Produced by the application of a strong acid, by acrid powders, as quicklime, &c.	The existence of the opacity can be detected by attentive observation.
Cutaneous Diseases.	Some articles of diet will bring on urticaria or nettlerash, in particular individuals, as shellfish, bitter almonds, &c. By acrids, acids, or any irritants applied to the surface. An ointment of tartarized antimony causes a painful pustular eruption. See Porrigo, in this list.	By careful watching and examination on the part of practitioner and nurse.
Deafdumbness.	.....	The really deaf and dumb acquire an expression of countenance and gestures which it is difficult to assume. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Deafness.	It may be assumed or excited by putting a pea in the ear, or by inserting irritants, so as to induce inflammation and temporary loss of function.	Make a noise when not expected, and see if the countenance varies or pulse rises. Put to sleep by opium, and then fire a pistol close to the ear, when he may be thrown off his guard. Examine the ear to see if any trick has been played there. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Death.	Some persons possess the power of suspending or moderating the action of the heart.	If suspected, the plan recommended under apoplexy will be found most efficacious.
Debility, see Cachexia.
Deformity.	.....	Examine the part and its articulation naked, and compare it with the opposite.
Delirium.	.....	Real delirium is accompanied by bodily disease; with general wandering and incoherency. The feigned is more confined to special subjects.
Delivery.	After enlargement produced artificially, a subsidence of the tumefaction; the parts being moistened by borrowed blood, and the child of another substituted as the female's own.	Can only be positively detected by examination per vaginam. Soon after delivery, the vagina will be relaxed and the lochial discharge be flowing in greater abundance, the shorter the time that may have elapsed since delivery.
Diarrhœa.	Said to have been caused by a mixture of vinegar and burnt cork. May be occasioned by the use of any of the purgative roots, &c.	When diarrhœa is feigned by the lower classes, inspect the linen; if clean, the bowels are probably not much out of order. Let every individual have a close stool of his own; and inspect the evacuations, taking care that one suffering under the disease does not lend his evacuations to another.
Dropsy.	May be feigned, like pregnancy, by wearing pads. The anasarcous condition of the lower limbs has been caused by applying a ligature round them. By inflating the cellular membrane of the abdomen.	Can be detected by attentive examination. There will be a want of that leucophlegmatic habit which accompanies and characterizes dropsy.
Dysentery.	May be feigned, like diarrhœa, by adding a little blood to the evacuations, or by introducing a soap, or some more irritating, suppository.	Same rules as under diarrhœa.
Epilepsy.	The foaming of the mouth has been produced by keeping a piece of soap in it.	Sensation in epilepsy is totally abolished. If any remain, disease probably feigned. Incontractility of pupil, which occurs in epilepsy, cannot be feigned. Same means to be used as in feigned apoplexy.
Fever.	By various stimulants, as wine, brandy, pepper; swallowing a small quantity of tobacco, or introducing it into the anus. Flour or chalk used to whiten the tongue. Redness of skin, caused by friction with a hard brush.	This deceit is generally developed by an examination of a day or two. Where flour or chalk has been used to whiten the tongue, the line of demarcation between the whitened part and the clean, healthy margin of the tongue, is too well marked to escape observation.
Fistula in Ano.	By making an incision near the verge of the anus, and introducing into it an acrid tent, such as the root of white hellebore.	By careful examination.
Fractures.	There is generally nothing but the man's own testimony. He complains of pain in the part; if fracture of the skull be feigned, he states, perhaps, that he becomes deranged on tasting liquor.	By attentive examination.
Hæmatemesis.	By drinking the blood of some animal, or using some coloured liquid, and then throwing it up.	By cutting off the supply of the fluid and careful examination.
Hæmoptysis.	By secreting bullock's blood for the purpose of colouring the saliva; making small incisions in the mouth; using bole armeniac or paint of vermilion.	Blood from the lungs is frothy and light-coloured. Mouth and fauces must be carefully inspected, and the individual be observed.
Hæmorrhoids.	By introducing bladders of rats or of small fish partly into the rectum. The linen has also been stained with borrowed blood.	The means are obvious.
Heart, Diseases of, see Palpitation.
Hepatitis.	.....	Unless the person be a welleducated impostor, acute inflammation of the liver will be detected by the absence of marks of strong inflammatory action. Chronic liver disease is, frequently, not characterized by wellmarked symptoms, and hence, when assumed, is difficult of detection.
Hernia.	In the same manner as hydrocele;—by inflation.	The detection is easy.
Hydrocele.	By puncturing the skin of the scrotum, and inflating the cellular membrane.	Do.
Hydrocephalus.	By opening the integuments of the head near the vertex, e. g. and blowing in air.	Do.
Hysteria.	.....	Does not easily resist the application of strong sternutatories to the nostrils. Attentive examination necessary

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Insanity.	.....	The expression of countenance cannot easily be feigned. Nor can the affection be kept up so long as in real mental alienation. The individual cannot do so long without food, sleep, &c.
Jaundice.	By colouring the skin with an infusion of turmeric or tincture of rhubarb. Clay-coloured stools produced by taking daily a small quantity of muriatic acid. High-coloured urine by rhubarb taken internally.	The eyes cannot be coloured, although smoke has been used for this purpose. The skin must be washed to remove the colouring matter if any exist, and the supply of acid and rhubarb be prevented.
Lameness.	By keeping the limb in a contracted state, and resisting any efforts to move it.	By two persons taking hold of the individual and moving rapidly along with him; and when they are tired having relays. The impostor will generally give in. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Menstruation.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.	By cutting off the supply.
Myopia.	.....	Present an open book, and apply the leaves close to the nose. If it cannot be read distinctly, when thus placed, or when glasses proper for short-sightedness are used, the disease is feigned.
Ophthalmia.	Excited by a variety of acrid and corrosive substances applied to the eye; as lime, &c. A portion of black muslin, spread over the cornea. The eyelashes are sometimes extracted, and caustic applied to excite disease in the palpebræ.	When ophthalmia is thus excited, its progress is ordinarily very rapid, arriving at its height within a few hours.
Ozæna.	By impregnating a piece of sponge with some offensive juices or oils, mixed with decayed cheese, and putting the imbued sponge into the nostrils.
Pains.	.....	The detection is here often difficult. The non-existence of pain cannot be proved, and great pain may be present without any appearance externally. The imposition is more frequently detected by inconsistencies and contradictions in the patient's history of the case, than in any other manner.
Palpitation.	White hellebore, given in the dose of 10 or 12 grains, and repeated, will occasion general indisposition, and undue action of the heart.	Cut off the supply.
Shaking Palsy.	.....	May be suspected, if the person be in an ordinary state of vigour. Use violent remedies and means, recommended under Chorea.
Paralysis.	.....	Violent remedies are here required. Cold affusion, actual cautery, electric shocks, &c. By anæsthetics, as under Aphonia.
Phthisis Pulmonalis.	Individuals with long necks and contracted shoulders have simulated phthisis, by covering the chest with blisters, cicatrices of issues, &c., and by taking drugs which cause paleness.	By attentive examination of the symptoms.
Polypus Nasi.	By introducing the testicle of a young cock, or the kidney of a rabbit, into the nostril, and retaining it there by means of a sponge fastened to it.
Porrigo or Scalled Head.	By applying nitric acid to the head, after protecting the face with fatty substances; but the chronic state is imitated by the use of depilatories of different kinds applied sometimes in patches, so as to resemble Porrigo decalvans.
Pregnancy.	By wearing pads, and assuming the longing after particular articles of diet, &c.	By the absence of the areola; the presence of a pad; and, if necessary, by examination per vaginam.
Prolapsus Ani.	By a portion of the intestine of the ox, in which a sponge filled with a mixture of blood and milk is placed.
Prolapsus Uteri.	By a similar fraud.
Pulse, Weakness or Defect of.	By ligatures applied to the corresponding arm. Slowness of pulse may be caused by the use of Veratrum viride.	By examining whether the arteries of the two arms beat alike; and if a ligature be placed on the arm.
Rheumatism, Chronic.	By complaining of great suffering on moving the limbs, and of pain and stiffness of the joints.	By careful observation, and the use of anæsthetics, as under Aphonia. It is frequently feigned, and not easy of detection. See Pains.
Scrofula.	By exciting ulcers below the angles of the jaw.	By examining the general habit, and observing whether the ulcerations be glandular, and the discharge of a scrofulous character.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
Scurvy.	By covering the teeth with wax, and then applying acid corrosive substances to the gums.	By examining the general habit; whether debilitated, cachectic, and possessing the usual general signs of scorbutus.
Stammering.	.....	Simulators of this defect generally state, that it is connate, or ascribe it to a fit of apoplexy or severe fever. Where the organs of speech were perfect, and the moral evidence of the previous existence of the infirmity was not satisfactory, the French authorities used to confine the soldiers, and not supply them with food, until they called for it without stammering.
Strabismus.	.....	If the person be roused suddenly from sleep, the eyes will be right, as they also are during sleep. Under anæsthetics they would be so likewise.
Stricture of the Urethra.	.....	By passing a bougie.
Swelling of the Legs.	By ligatures round the thighs.	Examine the limbs uncovered.
Syncope.	Ligatures are sometimes used to prevent the pulse being felt. By applying lotions to the face to make it pale.	By using sternutatories. By the absence of some of the symptoms of syncope. Examine the naked arms. Wash the face.
Tuberculosis, see Phthisis.
Tympany.	Persons have possessed the power of swallowing air, so as to distend the stomach, and simulate tympany.
Ulcer of the Ear.	By introducing a tent, imbued with blistering plaster into the ear, and repeating the application, until the tube becomes ulcerated, and a discharge of puriform matter is established. The fetid smell is imitated, by dropping into the ear a mixture of empyreumatic oil, asafœtida, and old cheese. Also, by introducing a little honey into the meatus.	By careful examination.
Ulcers of the Legs, &c.	By corrosives, or irritants. Sometimes by abrasion, by rubbing sand on the shin-bone. At others, they are pretended, by gluing on a piece of spleen or the skin of a frog.	Artificial ulcers have, usually, a more distinct margin, and are more readily healed than others; the latter being generally indicative of an impaired constitution.
Urine, Bloody.	The fruit of the Indian Fig (Cactus opuntia) colours the urine as red as blood. Cantharides will cause it. Blood may also be procured and mixed with the urine.	By making the patient pass his urine in the presence of the physician, and examining the vessel before and after. By cutting off the supply of any substance which could cause the appearance.
Urine, Incontinence of.	.....	Difficult, at times, of detection. Give the person a full dose of opium, and introduce the catheter when he is asleep. If there be urine, the incontinence is feigned.
Varicose Veins.	By a ligature, placed tightly round the limb. They may be excited in this manner, or aggravated if already existing.	By examining the limb.

S.) seu Perox'idum Hydra'tum, Ferru'go, Hydras Fer'ricus, Hydroöxide of Iron, Hydra'ted peroxide of Iron, Hydrated Tritoxide of Iron. It may be prepared by taking a solution of sulphate of iron, increasing its dose of oxygen by heating it with nitric acid, and precipitating the oxide by adding pure ammonia in excess, washing the precipitate, and keeping it moist.

In the Ph. U. S. 1863, it is directed to be prepared by adding water of ammonia to a solution of tersulphate of iron; washing the precipitate until the washings pass nearly tasteless. It is then mixed with water and transferred to a wide-mouthed bottle, which must be kept well-stopped.

It has been brought forward as an antidote to arsenic; and many cases of its efficacy have been published.

FE'VER, Fe'bris, (feritas, 'wildness,' or from fervor, 'heat,' or from februo, 'I purify:') Pyr, Pyr'etus, (F.) Fièvre. One of the most frequent and dangerous affections to which the body is liable. A person has an attack of fever, when he is affected with rigors, followed by increased heat of skin, quick pulse, languor, and lassitude. Rigors, increased heat, and frequency of pulse have each been assumed as the essential character of fever. It is not characterized, however, by any one, but depends upon the coexistence of many symptoms. Fevers have been usually divided into the idiopath'ic or essent''ial, and the symptomat'ic. The idiopathic arise without any obvious local cause. The symptomatic are dependent upon local irritation. Idiopathic fevers may be divided into three classes: 1. Those attended with distinct paroxysms:—intermittents. 2. Remittent and continued fevers: and 3. Fevers complicated with eruptions,—the exanthematous. These divisions admit of great variety, owing to climate, season, soil, age, &c. All ages and climates are liable to fever; and its exciting causes are very numerous. These causes may be common; as irritations in the intestines; external injuries, stimulants, &c.; or they may be specific; as miasmata, contagion, &c. The greatest diversity has prevailed regarding the theory of fever. Its primary seat has been placed in the brain, mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, skin, nerves, blood-vessels, liver, vena cava, pancreas, &c. It would seem, however, that although, in fever, the whole of the functions are morbidly impressed, the arguments in favour of the impression being first made on the nervous system and the system of nutrition are the strongest. The exciting cause of fever, whatever it may be, produces an irregular action in the system of nutrition, which is soon conveyed to the rest of the system, owing to the extensive sympathy which exists between every part of the body; and it is probable, that all those local inflammations and congestions are the consequence, rather than the cause, of this disordered condition of the system. The general character of fever is clearly shown by examination of the blood. When fever is devoid of inflammatory complication, the quantity of fibrin is in no case augmented. It frequently remains in the healthy proportion, and at times diminishes to an extent not met with in any other acute disease. The alteration of the blood in fevers, which consists generally in a diminution of the fibrinous element, is the reverse of what occurs in inflammation.

Many phenomena of fever are influenced by that periodic''ity, which we notice in the exercise of several of the functions of the body. The types of intermittents are strong evidences of such an influence.

In the treatment of fever, it is important to bear in mind, 1. Its tendency, particularly in the case of the exanthemata, to run a definite course, and terminate in restoration to health. 2. The disposition to local determination or hyperæmiæ:—the most frequent cause of the fatal termination of fever; a circumstance requiring the vigilant attention of the physician. 3. That the symptoms must be attentively studied, in order to deduce, as far as possible from them, the indications of cure. Lastly, attention must be paid to the prevalent epidemic. There are particular seasons in which fevers are very malignant; and others in which they are as mild; circumstances which necessarily have an effect upon the treatment.

Sauvages, Cullen, and others regard it as a variety of typhus; and Pinel, as a species of gastro-adynamic or bilious putrid fever. It occurs, endemically, annually within the tropics; but is met with epidemically in the temperate regions. Broussais regards the disease as gastro-enteritis, exasperated by atmospheric heat; so that it runs through its stages with much greater rapidity than the gastro-enteritis of our climates. The yellow colour of the skin, according to him, is owing to the inflammation of the small intestine,—and especially of the duodenum,—augmenting the secretion of the liver, and at the same time preventing its discharge into the duodenum. The pathology of this affection, as well as its origin, is still unsettled. The treatment must generally be of the most active nature at the onset; consisting in bleeding largely, and exhibiting mercury, so as to excite a new action, if possible;—the other symptoms being combated according to general principles. It must vary, however, according to the epidemic.

FI'BRE, Fi'bra, Is, Cte'don, Fi'lum. An organic filament, of a solid consistence, and more or less extensible, which enters into the composition of every animal and vegetable texture. The simple or elementary fibre of the ancients, from a particular assemblage and arrangement of which every texture of the body was conceived to be constituted, is entirely ideal. The moderns usually admit, with Haller and Blumenbach, three elementary fibres or tissues. 1. The cellular or areolar, formed chiefly of thin plates, of a whitish colour, and extensible, which seems to consist of concrete gelatin. 2. The nervous, pulpy, or med'ullary, formed of a soft substance, contained in a cellular sheath, and consisting of albumen united to a fatty matter. 3. The muscular, composed of round filaments, of a grayish or reddish colour, and formed of fibrin. Chaussier has added to these the albugineous fibre, but it seems to differ from the cellular fibre only in greater condensation of the molecules. See Fibrous.

It enters into the composition of the chyle and the blood; is the self coagulable material in them, and is produced in the retrograde metamorphosis of the tissues. It is in small proportion in the blood; but its cipher increases in inflammation, whilst in continued fever it is diminished. Muscular fibrin, Syn'tonin, Mus'culin, has been shown, however, to be different from that of the blood. In certain diseased actions, Fibrin or Coagulable lymph, Gluten, is separated from the blood, and is found in considerable quantity on the surfaces of membranes, and in the cavities of the body. See Liquor Sanguinis.

Fibrin is likewise a proximate principle of vegetables, and differs but little in chemical composition from animal fibrin; nor does it differ much from albumen and casein.

Fibrin is very nutritious.

It comprises, particularly, the periosteum and perichondrium; the articular capsules and ligaments; the tendons; the dura mater, pericardium, tunica sclerotica, tunica albuginea testis, outer membrane of the spleen, &c. Under simple fibrous tissues, Te'læ fibro'sæ, certain writers have classed the white and yellow fibrous tissues, and areolar tissue. Both the yellow and the white may be detected in the areolar tissue. The white is said to exist alone in ligaments, tendons, fibrous membranes, aponeuroses, &c. The yellow, (F.) Tissu jaune, exists separately in the middle coat of the arteries, the chordæ vocales, ligamentum nuchæ of quadrupeds, &c. It differs from the white in possessing a high degree of elasticity, owing to the presence of a distinct principle, called by MM. Robin and Verdeil Élasticine.

FIS'TULA, ('a pipe or reed,') Syr'inx, Syrin'ga, Aul'us, Fis'tule: when of a small size, Aulis'cus. A solution of continuity, of greater or less depth and sinuosity; the opening of which is narrow, and the disease kept up by an altered texture of parts, so that it is not disposed to heal. A fistula is incomplete or blind, when it has but one opening; and complete when there are two, the one communicating with an internal cavity, the other externally. It is lined in its whole course by a membrane which seems analogous to mucous membranes. Incomplete fistulæ may be internal or external. The former are those which open internally; the latter those which open externally. External incomplete fistulæ are kept up by caries or necrosis of bones, by extraneous bodies in any of the living textures, or by purulent cavities, the walls of which have not become united. Internal incomplete fistulæ generally soon become complete, since the discharge that escapes from them into the cavities into which they open has a constant tendency to make its way outwardly, and soon occasions ulceration of the integuments. Fistulæ have received different names, according to the discharge which they afford, and the organs in which they are seated,—as lachrymal, biliary, salivary, synovial, and urinary—Fis'tula uri'næ, U'rias. The great object of treatment in fistulous sores is to bring on an altered condition of the parietes of the canal, by astringent or stimulating injections, caustics, the knife, pressure, &c. Those which are dependent on diseased bone, cartilage, tendon, &c., do not heal until after the exfoliation of the morbid part. Fistulæ of excretory ducts are produced either by an injury of the duct itself or by the retention and accumulation of the fluids to which they have to give passage. Thus, Fis'tula lacryma'lis, Dacryosyr'inx, Emphrag'ma lacryma'lē, Hy'drops sac'ci lacryma'lis, Drop'sy of the lach'rymal sac, commonly proceeds from the obliteration of the nasal ducts, or from atony of the lachrymal sac; which circumstances prevent the tears from passing into the nostrils.

Fistula in A'no, A'nal fistula, Archosyr'inx, generally occurs from some mechanical pressure or impediment. The principal indication in the treatment of these fistulæ of the excretory canals being to put a stop to the constant discharge of the secretions, &c., through the preternatural channel, the fistulous passage is at times laid open, and a communication established with the natural excretory canal; at others, strong pressure is employed to procure its obliteration.

FŒ'TAL, Fœta'lis. Relating to the fœtus. A name given to the parts connected with the fœtus. Thus we say—the fœtal surface of the placenta, in contradistinction to the uterine or maternal surface.

FŒTAL CIRCULA'TION differs from that of the adult in several respects. Commencing with the placenta, where it probably undergoes some change analogous to what occurs in the lungs in extra-uterine existence, the blood proceeds by the umbilical vein as far as the liver, where a part of it is poured into the vena porta; the other proceeds into the vena cava inferior; the latter, having received the suprahepatic veins, pours its blood into the right auricle. From the right auricle, a part of the blood is sent into the right ventricle; the rest passes directly through into the left auricle, by the foramen ovale. When the right ventricle contracts, the blood is sent into the pulmonary artery; but as the function of respiration is not going on, little blood passes to the lungs; the rest goes through the ductus arteriosus into the aorta. The blood, received by the left auricle from the lungs, as well as that which passed through the foramen ovale, is transmitted into the left ventricle, by the contraction of which it is sent into the aorta, and by means of the umbilical arteries, which arise from the hypogastric, it is returned to the placenta.

FŒTAL HEAD. The diameters of this at the full period are as follows:—1. The Biparietal or transverse, extending from one parietal protuberance to the other, and measuring 3½ inches. 2. The Temporal, from one temple to another, 3 inches. 3. The Occipito-mental, from the occiput to the chin; the greatest of all, 5 inches. 4. The Occipito-frontal or antero-posterior, 4½ or 4¾ inches. 5. The Cervico-bregmatic, from the nape of the neck to the centre of the anterior fontanelle. 6. The Fronto-mental, from the forehead to the chin, about 3½ inches. 7. The Trachelo-bregmatic, from the front of the neck to the anterior fontanelle, 3½ inches. 8. The Vertical diameter, from the vertex to the base of the cranium.

FŒTOR ORIS, Breath, offensive.

FŒ'TUS, Fe'tus, Cye'ma, O'vum ventris, Sarcina. The young of any creature. The unborn child. (F.) Fétus, Faix, Fruit. By κυημα, Cye'ma, Hippocrates meant the fecundated, but still imperfect, germ. It corresponded with the term embryo, as now used; whilst εμβρυον, 'embryo,' signified the fœtus at a more advanced stage of utero-gestation. The majority of anatomists apply to the germ the name embryo, which it retains until the third month of gestation, and with some until the period of quickening; whilst fœtus is applied to it in its latter stages. The terms are, however, often used indiscriminately. When the ovule has been fecundated in the ovarium, it proceeds slowly towards, and enters the uterus, with which it becomes ultimately connected by means of the placenta. When first seen, the fœtus has the form of a gelatinous flake, which some have compared to an ant, a grain of barley, a worm curved upon itself, &c. The fœtal increment is very rapid in the first, third, fourth, and sixth months of its formation, and at the end of nine months it has attained its full dimensions—Enfant à terme. Generally, there is but one fœtus in utero; sometimes, there are two; rarely three. The fœtus presents considerable difference in its shape, weight, length, situation in the womb, proportion of its various parts to each other, arrangement and texture of its organs, state of its functions at different periods of gestation, &c. All these differences are important in an obstetrical and medico-legal point of view.

A simple fracture is when the bone only is divided. In a com'minuted fracture, Alphite'don, αλφιτηδον, Carye'don Catag'ma, καρυηδον καταγμα, the bone is broken into several pieces; and in a complicated fracture there is, in addition to the injury done to the bone, a lesion of some considerable vessel, nervous trunk, &c. Fractures are also termed transverse, oblique, &c., according to their direction. The treatment of fractures consists, in general, in reducing the fragments when displaced; maintaining them when reduced; preventing the symptoms which may be likely to arise; and combating them when they occur. The reduction of fractures must be effected by extension, counter-extension, and coaptation. The parts are kept in apposition by position, rest, and an appropriate apparatus. The position must vary according to the kind of fracture. Commonly, the fractured limb is placed on a horizontal or slightly inclined plane, in a state of extension; or rather in a middle state between extension and flexion, according to the case.

In consequence of the fracture having been well described by Dr. John Rhea Barton, of Philadelphia, it is often called after him.

When the frænum extends as far as the extremity of the tongue, it cramps its movements, interferes with sucking, &c. This inconvenience is remedied by carefully snipping it with a pair of scissors. The French call this l'opération du filet.

Frænum Pe'nis, F. seu Fræ'nulum seu Vin'culum Præpu'tii, F. Glan'dis, Cynodes'mion, Cynodes'mus, Vin'culum Cani'num, (F.) Filet ou Frein de la verge, is a membranous reflection which fixes the prepuce to the lower part of the glans. The Yaws, Epian, Pi'an. A disease of the Antilles and of Africa, characterized by tumours, of a contagious character, which resemble strawberries, raspberries, or champignons; ulcerate, and are accompanied by emaciation. The Pian, for so the Indians call it, differs somewhat in America and Africa.

Pi'an of Amer'ica, Frambœ'sia America'na, Anthra'cia Ru'bula Americana, occurs under similar circumstances with the next, and seems to be transmitted by copulation. The tumours have a similar form, and are greater in proportion to their paucity. In some cases they are mixed with ulcers.

Pi'an of Guin'ea, Frambœ'sia Guineen'sis, Anthra'cia Ru'bula Guineen'sis, is common amongst the negroes, especially in childhood and youth. It begins by small spots, which appear on different parts, and especially on the organs of generation and around the anus; these spots disappear, and are transformed into an eschar, to which an excrescence succeeds, that grows slowly, and has the shape above described.

The treatment is nearly the same in the two varieties. The tumours will yield to mercurial friction, when small. When large, they must be destroyed by caustic. In both cases, mercury must be given to prevent a recurrence.

An endemic disease resembling yaws was observed in the Feejee Islands by the medical officers of the United States' Exploring Expedition. It is called by the natives Dthoke.

FRONT, Frons, Meto'pon, Sto'ma, Forehead, Fore'front, Fore'top, Brow, (Sc.) Forret. That part of the visage which extends from one temple to the other, and is comprised in a vertical direction, between the roots of the hair and the superciliary ridges.

FRON'TAL, Fronta'lis. Relating or belonging to the front. This name has been given to several parts. Winslow, Sömmering, and others, call the anterior part of the occipito-frontalis—the frontal muscle or fronta'lis, Musculo'sa Fron'tis Cu'tem mo'vens substan'tia Par of Vesalius.

FRONTAL ARTERY, Arte'ria supra-orbita'lis, is given off by the ophthalmic, which is itself a branch of the internal carotid. It makes its exit from the skull at the upper part of the base of the orbit, and ascends the forehead between the bone and the orbicularis palpebrarum; dividing into three or four branches, which are distributed to the neighboring muscles.

FRONTAL BONE, Os fron'tis seu corona'lē seu inverecun'dum seu pup'pis seu syncip'itis seu pro'ræ seu ratio'nis, Meto'pon. A double bone in the fœtus, single in the adult, situate at the base of the cranium, and at the superior part of the face. It forms the vault of the orbit; lodges the ethmoid bone in a notch at its middle part; and is articulated, besides, with the sphenoid, parietal, and nasal bones, the ossa unguis, superior maxillary, and malar bones.

FRONTAL FUR'ROW extends upwards from the frontal spine, and becomes gradually larger in its course, to lodge the upper part of the superior longitudinal sinus, and to give attachment to the falx cerebri.

Frontal Nerve, Palpébro-frontal—(Ch.), is the greatest of the three branches of the ophthalmic nerve,—the first division of the fifth pair. It proceeds along the superior paries of the orbit, and divides into two branches:—the one internal, which makes its exit from the orbitar fossa, passing beneath the pulley of the oblique muscle:—the other, external, issuing from the same cavity by the foramen orbitarium superius.

Frontal Protu'berance, F. tuberos'ity, Tu'ber fronta'lĕ, Suggrun'dium supercilio'rum. The protuberance of the frontal bone above the superciliary arch.

Frontal Si'nuses, Si'nus Fronta'les, Metopan'tra, Prosopan'tra, Si'nus Supercilia'res seu pituita'rii fron'tis, Cavern'æ fron'tis, are two deep cavities in the substance of the frontal bone, separated from each other by a median septum, and opening, below, into the anterior cells of the ethmoid bone.

Frontal Spine, Cris'ta inter'na, is situate in the middle of the under part of the bone, and is formed by the coalescence of the inner tables for the attachment of the falx cerebri.

Surgeons have given the name Fronta'lis to a bandage or topical application to the forehead. Such have, also, been called προμετωπιδια and ανακολλημαται.

In the ordinary acceptation, it means exclusively seed cases, which are eatable; and, generally, such as require no preparation to render them fit for food. The effects of fruits on the body, in a medical as well as a dietetical point of view, are various. They may be distinguished into classes; for, whilst the Cerealia, for example, afford fruits which are highly nutritious, the Summer Fruits (Fruc'tus Horæ'i), which include strawberries, cherries, currants, mulberries, raspberries, figs, grapes, &c., are refrigerant and grateful, but afford little nourishment.

Fruit, (F.), is the fœtus, whilst contained in the womb of the mother.

It is also a native of the United States. In Ireland, it is used by the poor as an article of diet. As met with in America, it is of light yellow colour, and resembles plates of horn, crisped and translucent. An agreeable jelly is obtained from it by boiling it in water or milk, which forms a good article of diet in consumptive cases. Its properties are indeed exactly like those of the Iceland Moss.

When the wrack, in fruit, is dried, cleaned, exposed to a red-heat in a crucible with a perforated lid, and is reduced to powder, it forms the Æ'thiops vegetab'ilis—the Pulvis Quercûs Mari'næ of the Dublin Pharmacopœia—which is used, like the burnt sponge, in bronchocele and other scrofulous swellings. Its efficacy depends on the iodine it contains. Dose, gr. x to ℈ij, mixed in molasses or honey. See Soda.

FUNC'TION, Func'tio, Ac'tio, (F.) Fonction; (fungor, functus, 'to act,' 'perform.') The action of an organ or set of organs. Any act, necessary for accomplishing a vital phenomenon. A function is a special office in the animal economy, which has, as its instrument, an organ or apparatus of organs. Thus respiration is a function. Its object is the conversion of venous into arterial blood, and its instrument is the lungs. The ancient physiologists divided the functions into vi'tal, an'imal, and nat'ural. They called vital functions those which are essential to life, as innervation, circulation, respiration; animal functions, those which belong to the encephalon; viz.: the functions of the intellect, the affections of the mind, and the voluntary motions; and natural functions, Faculta'tes seu Actio'nes natura'les, those relating to assimilation, such as the actions of the abdominal viscera, of the absorbent and exhalant vessels, &c. Bichat divided the functions into those which relate to the preservation of the individual, and those that relate to the preservation of the species. The former he subdivided into animal and organic. The animal functions or functions of relation are those of the intellect, sensation, locomotion, and voice. The organic functions include digestion, absorption, respiration, circulation, secretion, nutrition, and calorification. The functions, whose object is the preservation of the species—the organic, nutritive, or vegetative functions — are all those that relate to generation;—such as conception, gestation, accouchement, &c. Each of these admits of numerous subdivisions in a complete course of Physiology;—for so the doctrine of the functions is called.

FUNC'TIONAL, Functiona'lis, (F.) Fonctionnel. Relating or belonging to the function of an organ, or to the functions in general.

FUNCTIONAL DISEASES, see Organic Diseases.

FUNCTIONAL or VI'TAL PHENOM'ENA are those produced by some modification in the action of an organ or organs, in contradistinction to those of a material or physical character;—thus we distinguish the functional phenomena of phthisis from those indicated by physical diagnosis — the physical phenomena.

FUN'DA, 'a sling.' Sphen'donē, (F.) Fronde. A bandage, composed of a fillet or long compress, cleft at its extremities to within about two inches of its middle. It is used in diseases of the nose and chin, and especially in cases of fracture of the lower jaw. In such case it has, also, been called Mentonnière, because placed beneath the chin; from (F.) Menton, 'the chin.'

FUNDAMENT, (fundare, 'to found; to lay the fundus or bottom of any thing.') Anus — f. Falling down of the, Proctocele.

FUNDAMEN'TAL, (F.) Fondamental. Some anatomists have called the sacrum Os Fundamenta'lē, because it seems to serve as a base to the vertebral column. The sphenoid bone has likewise been so denominated, from its being situate at the base of the cranium.

FUN'DUS, 'the bottom.' (F.) Fond. The base of any organ which ends in a neck, or has an external aperture, as the Fundus vesicæ, F. uteri, &c. Also, the Vulva.

The quality of that which is fungous: — fungous excrescence, Excrescen'tia fungo'sa. The fungosities which arise in wounds or ulcers are easily repressed by gentle compression, dry lint, the sulphas cupri, or other gentle caustics. At times, the more powerful are necessary, and sometimes excision is required.

FUN'GOUS, Fungo'sus, (F.) Fongueux. Having the characters of fungosity or fungus — as a fungous wound.

FUN'GUS, My'ces, (F.) Fongus, Champignon. The mushroom order of plants; class Cryptogamia, in the Linnæan system. The fungi or champignons, Ord. Mucoraceæ, (F.) Mucédinées ou Mucorinées, which are found as parasites in man, and the mammalia, are the following, according to M. Robin, — Trichoph'yton tonsu'rans, on the hairy scalp; T. sporuloïdes, on ulcers; Microsporum Audouï'ni, in the hair follicles; M. mentagroph'ytes, at the roots of the hair; M. furfur, in the skin; Mucor muce'do, in a cavity of gangrene of the lung; Acho'rion Schönlein'i, in the hairy scalp and hair follicles; Aspergilli species, [?] in the meatus auditorius externus; Puccin'ia fa'vi, in favus; Oidium albicans, in aphthæ; and Champignon du poumon, in the lung.

In Pathology, Fungus is commonly used synonymously with fungosity, myco'sis. M. Breschet has proposed to restrict the term fungos'ity to vegetations which arise on denuded surfaces, and to apply the term fungus to the tumours which form in the substance of the textures, without any external ulceration. Fici and warts, for example, would be fungi of the skin.

A series of phenomena, consisting in sensible movements, executed by animal parts, which are endowed with irritability, when placed in connexion with two metallic plates of different nature, between which a communication is established by direct contact or by means of a metallic wire. Galvanism has been employed medicinally in the same cases as electricity, and especially in neuralgic affections. It has been applied in the form of plates—'Mans'ford's plates.' In asthma, for example, a small blister, the size of a dollar, may be placed on the neck over the course of the phrenic and pneumogastric nerves, and another on the side, in the region of the diaphragm. One metal is placed mediately or immediately over the vesicated surface on the neck, and another over that in the side. They are then connected by means of a wire. The new nervous impression, in this way induced, is often signally beneficial.

Galvanic chains have been devised for the same purpose. The one most in use, called, after its inventor, 'Pulvermacher's Hydroelectric Chain Battery,' is a modification of the voltaic pile, capable of being employed topically.

GANG'LION, (γαγγλιον, 'a knot,') Gang'lium. In anatomy, a name generally given to a knot-like enlargement in the course of a nerve. It is applied, however, to organs differing considerably from each other in size, colour, texture, functions, &c. They are divided into gland'iform, lymphat'ic, and ner'vous. 1. Gland'iform gang'lions, called also ad'enoid, vas'cular, and sanguin'eous gang'lions; blind, apor'ic, duct'less, blood, and vas'cular glands,—gland'ulæ vasculo'sæ; gland'ulæ spu'riæ, &c., are organs of whose functions we are, in general, ignorant; and which have the appearance of glands. They are formed of agglomerated globules, pervaded by blood-vessels surrounded by areolar membrane, and contain a milky or yellowish fluid. To this class belong the spleen, thymus, thyroid, and supra-renal glands. They are, doubtless, concerned in sanguification. 2. Lymphat'ic gang'lions. See Conglobate. 3. Ner'vous gang'lions, Gang'lia seu Ganglio'nes seu No'di seu Nod'uli Nervo'rum, Tumo'res seu Plex'us ganglioform'es, Plex'us glandifor'mes, Tuber'cula nodo'sa Nervo'rum, Divertic'ula spirituum anima'lium, Gang'lia of increase, Form'ative gang'lia. Enlargements or knots in the course of a nerve. They belong, in general, to the system of the great sympathetic. One exists on the posterior root of every spinal nerve, and on one cerebral,—the 5th. Bichat regarded them as so many small brains, or centres of nervous action, independent of the encephalon, and intended exclusively for organic life. Being formed by the union of the cerebral and spinal nerves, they may send out the influence of both these nervous centres to the parts to which the nerves proceeding from them are distributed. Ganglia are chiefly composed of vesicular neurine; and appear to be concerned in the formation and dispensation of nerve power.

GANGLION, Emphy'ma encys'tis gang'lion. A globular, hard, indolent tumour, without change in the colour of the skin; of a size varying from that of a pea, to that of an egg, and always situate in the course of a tendon. The tumour is formed of a viscid, albuminous fluid, contained in a cyst of greater or less thickness. The cyst is sometimes loose; but in the majority of cases it communicates, by a narrow footstalk, with the sheath of a tendon, or even with the synovial capsule of a neighbouring articulation. The causes are generally unknown. The treatment consists in compression, percussion, the use of discutients, extirpation, or incision.

GANGRÆNOSUS, Gangrenous.

GANG'RENE, Gangræ'na, Cancre'na, Hot mortification, (F.) Gangrène, G. Chaude, Asphyxie des parties. Privation of life or partial death of an organ. Authors have generally distinguished mortification into two stages; naming the first incip'ient mortifica'tion or gang'rene. It is attended with a sudden diminution of feeling in the part affected; livid discoloration; detachment of the cuticle, under which a turbid fluid is effused; with crepitation, owing to the disengagement of air into the areolar texture. When the part has become quite black, and incapable of all feeling, circulation, and life, it constitutes the second stage, or mortification, and is called sphac''elus. Gangrene, however, is frequently used synonymously with mortification,—local asphyxia being the term employed for that condition, in which the parts are in a state of suspended animation, and, consequently, susceptible of resuscitation. When the part is filled with fluid entering into putrefaction, the affection is called hu'mid gang'rene, (F.) Gangrène humide: on the other hand, when it is dry and shrivelled, it constitutes dry gang'rene; (F.) Gangrène sèche. To this class belongs the gangræ'na seni'lis, G. Pott'ii, Presbysphac''elus, or sponta'neous gangrene of old people, which rarely admits of cure. Whatever may be the kind of gangrene, it may be caused by violent inflammation, contusion, a burn, congelation, the ligature of a large arterial trunk, or by some inappreciable internal cause.

The treatment, both of external and internal gangrene, varies according to the causes which produce it. Gangrene from excessive inflammation is obviated by antiphlogistics; and that from intense cold by cautiously restoring the circulation by cold frictions, &c. When the gangrene has become developed, the separation of the eschars must be encouraged by emollient applications, if there be considerable reaction; or by tonics and stimulants, if the reaction be insufficient.

As met with, it is a mixture of the fluids secreted by that organ with those of the supra-diaphragmatic portion of the alimentary canal. Owing to such admixture, the most contrary properties have been assigned to it. That such a fluid is secreted, which concurs powerfully in digestion, is evident from many considerations, and has been positively proved by the author and numerous others. It was found by him to contain, in man, chlorohydric and acetic acids, which are associated with a ferment, pepsin. The gastric fluid in cases of sudden death sometimes corrodes and perforates the stomach; giving rise to interesting questions in medical jurisprudence.

A disease, characterized by pyrexia; great anxiety; heat and pain in the epigastrium, increased by taking any thing into the stomach; vomiting and hiccup. Gastritis may either be seated in the peritoneal or mucous coat. It is most frequently in the latter—Esogastri'tis, Endogastri'tis, Gastromycaderi'tis, Gastri'tis mucosa—being excited directly by acrid ingesta. It requires the most active treatment;—bleeding, blistering, fomentations, diluents, &c. Some degree of inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach was considered by the followers of Broussais to be present in almost all fevers; and the various forms of dyspepsia have been supposed by some to be nothing more than chron'ic endogastri'tis.

They are long, flat, and thick; and arise—the former from the posterior part of the outer condyle of the femur; the latter, from the posterior part of the inner condyle of the same bone. The aponeurosis, which unites these muscles below, joins with that of the Solaris, and forms with it, a large tendon, which, under the name Tendo Achillis, is inserted at the posterior part of the calcaneum. GAZ, Gas, (Sax. gaɼt, [G.] Geist, 'spirit,' [?]) Air. Van Helmont first designated by this name—the etymology of which is not certain—the carbonic acid developed in the vinous fermentation. Afterwards, the term was appropriated to every permanently elastic fluid; that is, which preserves its aëriform state at all temperatures; and ultimately it was extended to all aëriform bodies; which were divided into permanent and non-permanent gazes. The latter are generally termed vapours; they return to the liquid state, when a portion of their caloric is abstracted. The permanent gazes, or gazes properly so called, are numerous, and may be divided into three sections with regard to their effects on the animal economy.

1. Irrespirable gazes.	Ammoniacal gaz, chlorohydric acid gas, deutoxide of nitrogen, nitrous acid gaz, and chlorine.
2. Negatively deleterious gazes.	Hydrogen, nitrogen, carbonic acid.
3. Positively deleterious gazes.	Oxygen, protoxide of nitrogen, carburetted hydrogen, carbonic oxide, sulphuretted hydrogen, and arseniuretted hydrogen.

It is proper to remark that the term respirable has been very differently employed by different writers. Sometimes it has meant the power of supporting life when applied to the blood in the lungs. At others, all gases have been deemed irrespirable which are incapable of being introduced into the lungs by voluntary efforts,—without any relation to their power of maintaining vitality; and this is perhaps the best sense. The gazes were at one time employed in medicine under great expectations, especially by the enthusiastic Beddoes; but they are now scarcely ever had recourse to. They differ considerably in their effects on the animal economy. Some, as oxygen, are exciting; others, as azote, depressing; whilst others, again, as the Protoxide of nitrogen or laughing gas, produce the most singular effects.

A substance of a soft consistence, tremulous, and transparent, which is obtained by an appropriate treatment from animal or vegetable matters; hence the distinction into animal and vegetable jelly. The former is merely a concentrated solution of gelatin, left to cool.

Vegetable Jelly is found in the juice of the currant, mulberry, and of almost all acid fruits, when ripe. It is of itself colourless, but almost always retains a little colouring matter of the fruit which has furnished it. It has an agreeable taste; is scarcely soluble in cold water, but boiling water dissolves it readily: the jelly is, however, almost all deposited on cooling. If this aqueous solution be boiled for a long time, it becomes analogous to mucilage, and loses the property of being jellied on cooling.

GENERA'TION, Genera'tio, Gen'esis, Genne'sis, Go'nē, Go'nus, Procrea'tio, Procrea'tion, Breed'ing, ([L.] genere, genitum, γενω, or γενναω 'I engender.') Under this name physiologists comprehend the aggregate of functions, which concur, in organized beings, towards the production of their kind. The act of generation means the union of the sexes. See Coition. The writers of antiquity believed, that all organized bodies are produced, either by what is termed univ'ocal or reg'ular generation, Homogen'esis, Genera'tio homogen'ea, Propaga'tio, which applies to the upper classes of animals and vegetables, or by sponta'neous generation, Autogen'ia, Heterogen'esis, Heterogen'ia, Generatio heterogen'ea seu æquiv'oca seu primitiv'a seu primig''ena seu origina'ria seu sponta'nea, Spontéparité (Dugès), which they considered applicable to the very lowest classes only, as the mushroom, the worm, the frog, &c. There are still many distinguished naturalists who consider that beings, low in the scale of animality, are produced in the latter way. Spontaneous generation and equivocal generation have been regarded by many to be synonymous. Others, however, mean by spontaneous generation, the production of a new being from the mere combination of inorganic elements; whilst by equivocal generation they understand the evolution of a new being from organized beings dissimilar to themselves, through some irregularity in their functions, or through the incipient decay or degeneration of their tissues. As to the mode in which regular generation is accomplished, there have been many views. According to the doctrine of Hippocrates, and of the ancient philosophers, the ovaries of the female furnish a prolific fluid, similar to that of the male; and the fœtus results from the mixture of the two seeds in copulation. Steno and others conceived, that the ovaries contain ova, which are not developed until vivified by the male sperm. Bonnet and Spallanzani believed in the pre-existence of germs, created since the origin of the world, but encased in each other, and becoming developed in succession; whence it would follow that the ovary of the first female must have contained the germs of all subsequent generations: and that the number of these germs must go on always diminishing, until ultimately extinct. This was the system of evolu'tion of germs. According to Leeuenhoek, the ovarics do not contain eggs, but vesicles destined to receive animalcules; which, in his view, live in the sperm. Thousands of these animalcules are thrown into the uterus during copulation, and the most expeditious and vigorous reaches the ovary, after having scattered and destroyed its competitors. Buffon — admitting the hypothesis of the two seeds—supposed that they were formed of molecules proceeding from every part of the body of each parent; and that, by a kind of elective affinity, those which were furnished by the head, the trunk, or the extremities of the male parent, could only unite with those proceeding from the same parts of the female. Before him, Maupertuis, admitting, with many of the ancient philosophers, the system of Epigen'esis, and adopting, as regarded the composition of the sperm, a theory analogous to that of Buffon, had supposed that the molecules, capable of being organized, were attracted towards a centre; that the nose attracts the two eyes; the body, the arms; the arms, the hands, &c., nearly as the particles of a salt, dissolved in a liquid, arrange themselves in regular crystals around the same nucleus. These and various other systems have been successively proposed and abandoned, and the mystery of generation remains impenetrable.

The simplest kind of reproduction does not require sexual organs. The animal separates into several fragments, which form so many new individuals. This is Fissip'arous generation, Fissip'arism, G. from fis'sion, (F.) Fissiparité, Scissiparité, Scission, Cloisonnement, Reproduction ou Multiplication mérismatique. Gemmip'arous generation, (F.) Gemmiparité, Génération par Gemmation, Surculation ou Bourgeonnement, consists in the formation of buds, sporules or germs on some part of the body, which at a particular period drop off and form as many new individuals. These kinds of reproduction require but one parent — Monog''eny. In Ovip'arous generation, (F.) Oviparité, the egg is hatched out of the body. In o'vovivip'arous generation, the new being is hatched in the excretory passages. In vivip'arous generation, the new individual is born under its appropriate form; and in marsu'pial or marsu'piate generation, the young being, born at a very early stage of development, is received and nourished in a marsupium or pouch. In alter'nate generation, (F.) Génération alternante, the young not only do not resemble the parent at birth, but remain dissimilar during their whole life, so that their relationship is not apparent until a succeeding generation. Thus, the cercaria undergoes a change into the distoma. See Metagenesis. All these kinds of reproduction require the union of sexes — Dig''eny.

All the acts comprising the function of generation in man may be referred to five great heads. 1. Copulation. 2. Conception or fecundation. 3. Ges- tation or Pregnancy. 4. Delivery or Accouchement; and, 5. Lactation.

GLAND, Glans, dim. Glan'dula, 'an acorn, a kernel;' Aden. The ancient anatomists gave this name to a number of organs of a texture generally soft, and a shape more or less globular, but differing greatly in their nature and functions. They applied it, for instance, 1. To those organs which separate from the blood, any fluid whatever. When such organs were composed of several lobules, united by common vessels, they received the name conglom'erate glands, as the parotid, pancreas, &c. 2. To the reddish and spongy, knot-like bodies, which are met with in the course of the lymphatics. These they called con'globate glands;—see Ganglion, (lymphatic;) and 3dly and lastly, to various other organs, whose intimate texture and functions are still unknown, as the Pineal gland, Pituitary gland, Glands of Pacchioni, Thyroid gland, Thymus gland, Supra-renal glands, &c. Chaussier restricts the word gland to those softish, granular, lobated organs, composed of vessels, and a particular texture, of which there are in the human body, the lachrymal, salivary, and mammary, the testicles, the liver, pancreas, and kidneys. These permanent glands, or glands with permanent duets, are all destined to draw from the blood the molecules necessary for the formation of new fluids, and to convey these fluids externally, by means of one or more excretory duets. Several glands, besides their excretory duets, have special reservoirs, in which the fluids, secreted by them, collect, remain for a greater or less space of time, and undergo slight modifications before being evacuated; — such are, the gall-bladder for the liver, the urinary bladder for the kidneys, &c. Each gland has an organization peculiar to it, but we know not the intimate nature of the glandular texture. Malpighi believed that the vessels terminate in small, solid masses, to which he gave the name—glan'dular grains or ac''ini. In these, he considered, the excretory ducts originate. Ruysch thought that the glands are entirely vascular, and that the excretory duets are immediately continuous with the vasa afferentia, &c. The most accepted view, perhaps, is, that the secreting vessel is distributed on the animal membrane, which lines the minute excretory ducts, and that the secretion is effected from the liquor sanguinis by means of cells.

The term Glande (F.) is sometimes appropriated to the tumour formed by inflammation or engorgement of a lymphatic ganglion.

They are circular in the mammalia, and elliptical in birds and cold-blooded animals; are flat in all animals, and generally composed of a central nucleus enclosed in a membranous sac. Chemically, they consist of hæmatin and globulin — hæ'matoglob'ulin. The chemical composition of the nucleus, where it exists,—it does not in man,—has been by some regarded as fibrin; by others, as fat; and by others, again, as a species of horn, to which the name nu'clein has been given. See Globulin. Their average long diameter in man is about $\frac{1}{3000}$th part of an inch.

GLOB'ULIN, Glob'uline, Blood ca'sein. The colourless substance that remains after the abstraction of the colouring matter of the blood-globule. It is a peculiar albuminous principle. The globulin of Berzelius consists of the envelopes of the blood globules, and of the part of their contents that remains after the extraction of the hæmatin. Lecanu regards it as identical with albumen; and, according to Mulder, it belongs to the combinations of protein. Robin and Verdeil consider it to be albuminose.

The term globulin is likewise given by M. Donné to small granulations appertaining to the chyle, which are observable in the blood with the microscope. They are small, white, roundish, isolated or irregularly agglomerated grains; of about the 1-300 of a millimètre in diameter, and are regarded by M. Donné as the first elements of the blood-globules. They are the white granulated corpuscles of Mandl.

It is an oleaginous substance, of a sweet taste, little soluble in water, but readily in alcohol and ether. It depends, generally, on an inflammatory swelling of the organ. At times, however, a chronic glossocele, or sort of œdematous engorgement, is met with; which proceeds to a great length, and deforms the dental arches, the lips, &c. Inflammatory glossocele must be combated by antiphlogistics. In the œdematous kind, such as is sometimes oaused by excessive salivation, the infiltrated fluid may be pressed back by the hand of the practitioner, to get the tongue behind the teeth; and it may be kept there by a piece of gauze tied over the mouth. The chronic, elongated kind sometimes requires amputation of a portion of the organ.

This muscle is situate at the posterior part of the pelvis, and at the upper and posterior part of the thigh. It is large, thick, and quadrilateral; and is attached, above, to the posterior part of the crista ilii, to the part of the ilium comprised between the crista and the upper curved line, to the posterior surface of the sacrum, coccyx, and great sacro-sciatic ligament; and below, it terminates by a broad aponeurosis, which is inserted into the rugged surface that descends from the trochanter major to the linea aspera of the femur. This muscle extends the thigh on the pelvis, and rotates the thigh outwards. It is greatly concerned in station and progression.

GLU'TEN, gen. Glu'tinis, ('glue, paste,') Glu'tinum, Leutor, Veg''etable Gluten, Veg''etable Ca'sein. An immediate principle of vegetables. It is soft, of a grayish white, viscid consistence, and very elastic. Exposed to the air, it becomes hard, brown, and fragile; and, in moist air, putrefies. Water and alcohol do not dissolve it. It is soluble in vegetable, and in weak mineral, acids, at a high temperature. The farinæ, in which it is found, are those preferred for the preparation of bread; on account of the property it has of making the paste rise. It is a compound of protein, and hence has been ranged amongst the "proteinaceous alimentary principles" by Dr. Pereira. By washing wheaten dough with a stream of water, the gum, sugar, starch, and vegetable albumen are removed: the ductile, tenacious, elastic, gray mass left is the gluten, common gluten, Beccari'a's gluten. Pure gluten is the soluble portion on boiling common gluten in alcohol. Granu'lated gluten, Gluten granu'le, is a paste made by adding wheat gluten to ordinary wheat. The formulæ, however, differ. That of the United States is a muriate with two bases; and is prepared, according to the form of Dr. Chrestien, by dissolving the gold in a mixture of nitric and muriatic acids, and adding chloride of sodium to the residuum after evaporation; then redissolving and evaporating slowly to dryness. The Parisian formula for the Muriate d'or, Mu'rias seu Chlorure'tum Auri, consists in simply dissolving the gold in the acids, and evaporating to dryness. GONORRHŒA, (erroneously called from gono, and ῥεω, 'I flow,' because the older writers believed it to be a flux of semen;) Blennorrhag''ia, Blennorrhœ'a, B. urethra'lis, Blennure'thria, Phallorrhœ'a, Medorrhœ'a, M. viri'lis, Catar'rhus gonorrhœ'a seu ure'thræ, Urethri'tis, Inflamma'tio ure'thræ, Urethral'gia, Profiu'vium muco'sum ure'thræ, Catarrhus urethra'lis, (F.) Écoulement, Uréthrite, Urétrite. An inflammatory discharge of mucus from the membrane of the urethra in both sexes; and from that of the prepuce in man, and the vagina in woman. It may be excited spontaneously, or by irritants applied directly to the membrane; but is usually produced by impure connexion. Two great varieties have been generally reckoned.—1. GONORRHŒA PURA SEU BENIG'NA. That which does not follow an impure connexion; (F.) Échauffement, Blennorrhag''ia benig'na, Caulorrhœ'a benig'na, Catar'rhus Ure'thræ, Gonor- rhœ'a catarrha'lis seu noncontagio'sa; and, 2. Gonorrhœa Impu'ra, maligʼna, contagio'sa, syphilit'ica, et virulen'ta; Fluor albus maligʼnus, Fluxus venе'reus, Blennorrhœ'a luo'des, Baptorrhœ'a, Myxio'sis, Lues gonorrho'ica, Scroph'ulæ gonorrho'icæ, Tuber'cula gonorrho'ica, Clap, (Old E.) Chawdpys, (F.) Chaudepisse; that which is the result of impure commerce. The French also distinguish the Chaudepisse sèche, or that unaccompanied with discharge, and the Chaudepisse cordée, Gonorrhœ'a corda'ta, Chordurethri'tis, or that accompanied with chordee, and which of course occurs only in the male. See Chordee. It is the kind that most frequently engages the attention of the practitioner, and is characterized by mucous discharge from the urethra or vagina, intermixed with specific matter, and accompanied with burning pain on micturition. It is decidedly infectious. It is, however, a distinct disease from syphilis, and never produces it. Its duration is various, but the inflammatory symptoms usually subside in four or five weeks, generally leaving behind more or less of the gonorrhœa mucosa or gleet. Gonorrhœa of every kind, attended with any inflammatory symptoms, is best treated by the antiphlogistic regimen, avoiding every kind of irritation, and keeping the body cool by small doses of salts, and the urine diluted by the mildest fluids. After the inflammatory symptoms have subsided, cubebs, or the balsam of copaiba, exhibited in the dose of ℥ss to ℥j three times a day, will be found effectual: indeed, during the existence of the inflammatory symptoms, it often affords decided relief. Injections are rarely required.

Sometimes, gonorrhœa affects the glans; when it is called Gonorrhœa Spu'ria seu Bal'ani, Balanoblennorrhœ'a, Balanorrhœ'a, Balani'tis, Blennorrhag''ia spu'ria seu no'tha, (F.) Blennorrhagie du gland, Gonorrhée bâtarde, Fausse Blennorrhagie. It requires only cleanliness and cooling lotions. This is the simple form of balanitis. It may, however, be of the impure kind — Balanorrhag''ia, (F.) Balanite contagieuse. When implicating both glans and prepuce, it is Bal'ano-posthi'tis.

Some other varieties of gonorrhœa have been enumerated, but they are of little moment.

In consequence of repeated attacks of gonorrhœa, or of the debility induced by a single attack, it not unfrequenlly happens, as already remarked, that a constant, small discharge occurs, or remains behind, after all danger of infection is removed. The great difference between it and gonorrhœa is, that it is uninfectious. The discharge consists of globular particles, contained in a slimy mucus, and is generally devoid of that yellow colour which characterizes the discharge of gonorrhœa virulenta. It is unattended with pain, scalding, &c. To this state the names Gleet, Gonorrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennorrhœ'a chron'ica, Blennorhœ'a, &c., have been given. It is commonly a disease of some duration, and demands the use of the copaiba, astringent injections; and, if obstinate, the introduction of the bougie.

Gorget, Cutting, see Gorget, and Lithotomy.

Gorget for Fis'tula in A'no consists of a semicylindrical wooden staff, four inches long, without including the handle, and furnished with a wide groove. This is introduced into the rectum, to prevent the point of the bistoury from injuring the intestine, when the internal orifice of the fistula is deeply situate, and it is desirable to perform the operation by incision. This instrument, invented by Marchettis, has been modified by Percy, Runge, &c.

Desault invented an instrument for conducting the wire by the anus, in the operation for fistula by ligature. He called it Gorgeret à repoussoir.

Gorget, Lithot'omy, (F.) Gorgeret Lithotome, Cut'ting Gorg'et, is the one used in the operation for the stone, for the purpose of dividing the prostate and the neck of the bladder, so as to enable the surgeon to introduce the forceps and extract the stone. At the end of this gorget is a crest or beak, which fits the groove of the staff, and admits of the gorget being passed along it into the bladder. Besides cutting, there are also blunt gorgets, intended to be introduced into the wound—their concavity serving as a guide for the forceps into the bladder.

The chief modifications in the gorget have been made by Andouillet, Bell, Blicke, Bromfield, Cline, Desault, Foubert, Hawkins, Larrey, Lefèvre, Michaelis, Thomas, &c.

GOUT, Arthri'tis, Arth'ragra, Arthral'gia, Mor'bus domino'rum seu articula'ris, Ma'lum articulo'rum, Gut'to, Arthro'sia Pod'agra, Podal'gia, Pod'agra, Arthrit'icus ve'rus, Arthri'tis Podagra, Podagra Arthri'tis, Flux'io arthrit'ica, Fe'bris arthrit'ica seu Podag'rica, Arthrodyn'ia podag'rica, Caum'a podag'ricum, Flerecin, Gastroarthri'tis, Misopto'chos, (Sc.) Gut, (F.) Goutte, Agric of Pierry. The gout was formerly regarded as a catarrh, and received its name from (F.) goutte, (L.) gutta, 'a drop;' because it was believed to be produced by a liquid, which distilled, goutte à goutte, 'drop by drop,' on the diseased part. This name, which seems to have been first used about the year 1270, has been admitted into the different languages of Europe. Gout is an inflammation of the fibrous and ligamentous parts of the joints. It almost always attacks, first, the great toe; whence it passes to the other smaller joints, after having produced, or been attended with, various sympathetic phenomena, particularly in the digestive organs: after this, it may attack the greater articulations. It is an affection which is extremely fugitive, and variable in its recurrence. It may be acquired, or hereditary. In the former case, it rarely appears before the age of thirty-five; in the latter, it is frequently observed earlier. It is often difficult to distinguish it from rheumatism. A combination is, indeed, supposed to exist sometimes; hence called Rheumat'ic gout. During the paroxysm or fit, a burning, lancinating pain is experienced in the affected joint, attended with tumefaction, tension, and redness. One or more joints may be attacked, either at the same time or in succession; and, in either case, the attack terminates by resolution in a few days. This is the Arthri'tis acu'ta seu inflammato'ria seu regula'ris, Regular gout, Arthro'sia pod'agra regula'ris, Arth'ragra legit'ima seu vera seu genui'na seu norma'lis, (F.) Goutte régulière chaude. At other times, pains in the joints exist, of more or less acute character; the swelling being without redness. These pains persist, augment, and diminish irregularly, without exhibiting intermission, and, consequently, without having distinct paroxysms. The disease is then called aton'ic, asthen'ic, imperfect or irregular gout, Chronic G., Arthri'tis aton'ica seu asthen'ica, Arthro'sia Pod'agra larva'ta, Dysarthri'tis, Arth'ragra. It is commonly called in France Goutte froide, Goutte blanche. It may appear primarily, or succeed attacks of regular gout.

Gout does not always confine itself to the joints. It may attack the internal organs: when it is called Arthritis aber'rans seu errat'ica seu planet'ica seu vaga, Planar'thragra, Arth'ragra anom'ala, Pod'agra aber'rans, Vare'ni, Wandering, misplaced, or anomalous gout, (F.) Goutte vague.

Ret'rograde gout, Arthritis retrog'rada, Podagra retrog'rada, Arthro'sia Podagra complica'ta, Rece'dent or mispla'ced gout, (F.) Goutte remontée, G. malplacée, G. rentrée, is when it leaves the joints suddenly and attacks some internal organ, as the stomach, intestines, lungs, brain, &c.

Gout is also called, according to the part it may affect, Podagra, Gonagra, Chiragra, &c. It may be acute or chronic, and may give rise to concretions, which are chiefly composed of urate of soda. See Calculus, (arthritic.) It may, also, give occasion to nodosities, when it is called Arthritis nodo'sa, (F.) Goutte nouée.

The treatment of active gout is antiphlogistic, and the local disorder should be but little interfered with. Colchicum seems to have great power over the disease. It forms the basis of the Eau médicinale d'Husson, a celebrated French gout-remedy. The author — a long sufferer — relies wholly on the Vinum colchici radicis. The bowels must be kept regular by rhubarb and magnesia; and a recurrence of the disease be prevented by abstemious habits.

GOUT, (from gustus,) Taste.

Goût, Diaphragmatic, Angina pectoris.

Gout Paper, so called, Char'ta antiarthrit'ica, Charta antirheumat'ica, is made by spreading a very thin layer of a mixture of an ethereal or spirituous extract of the bark of mezereon root, with wax, spermaceti, and oil, over the surface of paper.

Granulations are the reddish, conical, flesh-like shoots, which form at the surface of suppurating wounds and ulcers. They are the product of inflammatory excitement, and may be produced in indolent ulcers, by exciting the parts by proper stimulants. They form the basis of the cicatrix.

GRANULATION is, likewise, a name given by the modern French physicians to an organic lesion, consisting in the formation of small, round, firm, shining, semi-transparent tumours, of the size and shape of millet-seed, or of a pea; which are met with in the lungs particularly, and in considerable quantity; often without materially interfering with their functions.

In pharmacy, granulation is a process by which a metal is reduced to fine grains, by melting it, and causing it, whilst liquid, to pass through a kind of sieve into a vessel of water,—as in the making of shot:— or by shaking or rubbing the melted metal in an appropriate box or vessel,—as in the formation of granular tin or granulated zinc.

They who speak thick, like the inhabitants of Newcastle, in England, or of Havre, in France, have difficulty in pronouncing the r, and they frequently substitute for it the letter l; but this does not properly constitute Grasseyement. It consists in this: that, in words in which the letter r is joined to another consonant, a sort of burring or guttural rolling is heard, nearly like that produced by gargling. See Rotacism.

A disease occasioned by small concretions, similar to sand or gravel, Gla'rea, (F.) Gravier, which forms in the kidneys, passes along the ureters to the bladder, and is expelled with the urine. These concretions, which are commonly composed of urates and an animal matter, are deposited at the bottom of the vessel, immediately after the excretion of the urine; and, by their hardness and resistance under the finger, differ considerably from the ordinary sediment of that liquid. A vegetable diet and alkaline drinks are the best prophylactics. See Calculi, urinary. A fit of the Gravel, Nephral'gia calculo'sa seu arenō'sa, Co'lica nephrit'ica, is the excruciating suffering induced by the passage of gravel from the kidney to the bladder. The relation between the weight of a body and its bulk: thus, supposing four bodies to be of the same size, but to weigh, one four, another three, another two, and the fourth one; the specific gravity of the first will be four times greater than that of the last. The specific gravities of different bodies are, therefore, as the weights, bulk for bulk. For solids, and liquids, water is taken as the unit; atmospheric air for the gases. Thus, water is 1.000; mercury, at the common temperature, 13.58. Whence, we conclude mercury is between thirteen and fourteen times heavier than water.

When the specific gravity of a substance is given, its temperature is assumed to be at 60° Fah.

GUTTA. A Drop, Stalag'ma, Stranx, Alun'sel, Stilla, (F.) Goutte. A quantity of liquid, generally valued, in pharmacy, at the weight of a grain. The weight, however, varies, according to different circumstances, as the degree of tenacity of the fluid, and the extent of moist surface to which the suspended drop is attached before it falls; and it was found by Mr. Alsop to be influenced by the size of the bottle, and the angle of inclination at which it was held during the operation of dropping. The following are some of his results as to the number of drops required to measure a fluidrachm, when dropped from a large and a small bottle.

(fʒj)	From a large bottle.	From a small bottle.
Diluted sulphuric acid	24 drops	84 drops
Scheele's hydrocyanic acid	35	70

Solution of ammonia	40	48
Tincture of opium	84	135
Rectified spirit	100	130
Tincture of chloride of iron	100	150

Prof. Wm. Procter, of Philadelphia, has given a table of the number of drops to a fluidrachm of essential oils, when dropped from the bottles from which they are commonly dispensed, and from a minim measure; and Mr. Edward Parrish one of different liquids dropped, under like circumstances, from pint and half pint tincture bottles, and from a minim measure. The following is the number of drops of different liquids equivalent to a fluidrachm—the result of the observations of Mr. Durand, of Philadelphia.

GUTTÆ NI'GRÆ, 'black drops,' Ace'tum o'pii, Common Black Drop, (F.) Gouttes noires. (Opii, ℥viij, Aceti destillat. ℔ij. Infuse.)

The celebrated Black Drop, Lan'caster or Quaker's Black Drop, may be made as follows. Take half a pound of opium, sliced; three pints of good verjuice, (juice of the wild crab,) one and a half ounce of nutmegs, and half an ounce of saffron. Boil to a proper thickness, and add a quarter of a pound of sugar, and two spoonfuls of yeast. Set the whole in a warm place, near the fire, for six or eight weeks; then place it in the open air until it becomes a syrup. Lastly, decant, filter, and bottle it up, adding a little sugar to each bottle. One drop is equal to three of laudanum; and it is nearly devoid of all the unpleasant exciting effects of the latter. An analogous formula is contained in the Pharmacopœia of the United States under the name Ace'tum opii, Vinegar of Opium. In the last edition, (1863,) a more easy mode of preparation is given. It consists in the entire extraction of the opium and aromatics by diluted acetic acid; the addition of sugar; and the dilution of the whole, so that a fluidounce shall contain 75 grains of opium. A grain of opium is represented by about 6½ minims.

An instrument for measuring the force of the blood in the vessels. It consists of a bent glass tube, the lower bent part of which is filled with mercury. A brass head is fitted into the artery, and a solution of carbonate of soda is interposed between the mercury and the blood, which is allowed to enter the tube for the purpose of preventing its coagulation. The pressure of the blood on the mercury in the descending portion of the bent tube causes the metal to rise in the ascending portion; and the degree to which it rises indicates the pressure under which the blood moves. A modification of this instrument has been called Cardiom'eter, (F.) Cardiomètre.

Blood is then passed by vomiting, and sometimes, also, by stool,—the blood being generally of a grumous aspect. Hæmatemesis may be active or passive, acute or chronic. The blood effused proceeds from rupture of vessel, or from a sanguineous exhalation at the surface of the mucous membrane of the stomach. It is often observed in females whose menstrual secretion is irregularly performed. It is not of much danger, except when connected with disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen. On dissection of those who have died from protracted hæmatemesis,—for the acute kind is comparatively devoid of danger,—the mucous membrane of the stomach is found red and inflamed, or black, and the vessels considerably dilated. Complete abstinence from food; rest; the horizontal posture; bleeding, if the hemorrhage be active; cold, acidulous drinks, &c., constitute the usual treatment.

The red colouring matter of the blood. It resides in distinct particles or globules, and, in the opinion of some observers, in the envelope of the globules. It appears to be of a peculiar character, and one that has not yet been determined by the chemist. That the colour of the blood is not owing to the peroxide of iron which it contains is shown by the fact mentioned by Scherer, that he removed the iron by acids, and yet a deep red tincture was formed when alcohol was added to the residuum.

Others, again, have applied it to effusions of blood into the interior of the tunica albuginea itself. (Richter.) The first is the usual acceptation. An extremely alarming carcinomatous affection, which was first described, with accuracy, by Mr. John Burns, of Glasgow. It consists in the development of cancerous tumours, with violent heat and pain, and with fungus and bleeding excrescences. Even when the diseased part is extirpated at a very early period, recovery rarely follows; other organs being generally implicated at the same time. Fungus hæmatodes was the term first applied to the disease by Mr. Hey of Leeds. Mr. J. Burns called it Spongoid inflammation, from the spongy, elastic feel, which peculiarly characterizes it, and continues even after ulceration has taken place. The disease has, most frequently, been met with in the eyeball, the upper and lower extremities, testicle and mamma; but it occurs in the uterus, ovary, liver, spleen, brain, lungs, thyroid gland, and in the hip and shoulder joints.

Some French surgeons designate, by this name, those tumours which were formerly termed anormales, caverneuses, variqueuses, called Érectiles by Dupuytren, Hématoncies, by Alibert, and Telangiectasiæ by Gräfe.

Hemorrhage from the mucous membrane of the lungs; characterized by the expectoration of more or less florid and frothy blood. It is generally preceded by cough; dyspnœa; sense of heat in the chest, &c. It is important to discriminate betwcen hæmoptysis produced by some accidental cause acting irregularly or periodically on the lungs; and that which is, as it were, constitutional, and dependent on organic affection of the lungs or heart, or some faulty conformation of the chest. These two varieties differ as much in their prognosis and method of treatment as in their causes. Constitutional hæmoptysis is a serious disease, almost always announcing phthisis pulmonalis. The accidental variety is chiefly dangerous by frequent recurrence, and consequent great loss of blood.

The general causes of hæmoptysis are the same as those of other kinds of hemorrhage. It has, besides, particular causes; such as too great exercise of the lungs; loud speaking; playing on wind instruments, breathing acrid vapours, &c. It usually occurs between puberty and the age of 35. A sudden and terrific kind of hæmoptysis is sometimes met with; consisting in a great afflux of blood to the lungs. This has been called Pul'monary Ap'oplexy, Apoplex'ia pulmona'lis seu pulmo'num, Pneumorrhag''ia, Infarc'tus hæmorrhag''icus pulmo'num, I. hæmopto'icus Laënnec'ii, (F.) Apoplexie pulmonaire, Hémoptysie foudroyante, Hémorrhagie interstitielle du Poumon. Infiltration of blood into the air-cells may occur without any spitting of blood. Any extravasation of blood into the tissue of the lungs has been termed by M. Hendrin pneumohémorrhagie.

Physical signs. Percussion may not always aid us in hæmoptysis, but generally a circumscribed dulness will be perceived. The inspiratory murmur, on auscultation, is feeble or absent, locally; and is replaced by bronchial respiration and bronchophony. A fine liquid crepitus is detected around the affected part; and in the larger tubes, near the spine, a liquid bubbling rhonchus is usually heard. The value of these signs is determined by the nature of the expectoration. The treatment of hæmoptysis must be like that of internal hemorrhage in general.

HÆMORRHAG''IA, (hæma, and ῥηγνυμι, 'I break forth.') San'guinis profu'vium copio'sum, Sanguiflux'us, Hæmatoch'ysis, Aimorrhœ'a, Hæmorrhœ'a, Hæmatorrhag''ia, Hæmatis'mus, Hæmatorrhœ'a, Hæmator'rhysis, Hæmor'rhysis, Profu'vium seu Prorup'tio seu Erup'tio seu Profu'sio san'guinis, Hem'orrhage, Hæmorrhage, Bleeding, Loss of blood, Rup'turing, bursting, or breaking of a bloodvessel, (Prov.) Floating, (F.) Hémorrhagie ou Hémorhagie, Perte de sang, Flux de sang. Any discharge of blood from vessels destined to contain it; with or without rupture of their coats. Hemorrhages may be spontaneous or traumatic: the first belong to the domain of medicine, the latter to that of surgery. They may, also, be internal or external; general — as in scurvy—or local. The hemorrhages by exhalation — those which chiefly interest the physician — have been classed, by Pinel, as follows:—1. Hemorrhage of the Mucous Membranes; Epistaxis, Hæmoptysis, Hæmatemesis, Hæmorrhoids, Hæmaturia, Uterine Hemorrhage. 2. Hemorrhage of the Tissues; Cutaneous, Cellular, Serous, Synovial.

Hemorrhages have generally been distinguished into active and passive: in other words into those dependent upon augmentation of the organic actions, and those dependent upon debility. According to Broussais, no spontaneous hemorrhage is passive; all are active, — that is, produced by increased action and excess of irritation of the blood-vessels: they may occur with debility, but not from debility. He calls those only passive hemorrhages, which are owing to an external lesion of the vessels. Hemorrhages have been, by some, divided into constitutional, or those depending on original conformation:—accidental, or those produced by some adventitious cause; supplementary, or those which succeed others; symptomatic, critical, &c. A secondary hemorrhage is one that occurs some time after wounds or operations.

When hemorrhage takes place into any tissue, or is interstitial, it receives the name, with many, of apoplexy.

Active Hemorrhage, Hemorrhag''ia acti'va seu arterio'sa, Caum'a hæmorrhag''icum, Angeiorrhag''ia, occurs chiefly in the young and plethoric. Good living; the use of fermented liquor, excessive exercise, or too sedentary a life, may perhaps be ranked as predisponent causes. It is commonly preceded by heaviness and pulsation in the part, — owing to the afflux of blood and consequent hyperæmia,—and by coldness of the extremities. The blood, evacuated, is generally of a florid red. In such active hemorrhages, the great indications of treatment will be, to diminish plethora where it exists, and to lessen the heart's action. Bleeding, purgatives, and cold, with dry diet, will be the chief agents.

Passive Hemorrhage, Hæmorrhag''ia passi'va seu veno'sa, Profu'sio, P. hæmorrhag''ica, occurs in those of weak constitution; or who have been debilitated by protracted disease, poor diet, long watching, excessive evacuations, &c.

The direct causes may be; previous active hemorrhage; scorbutus, or any thing capable of inducing atony or asthenic hyperæmia of the small vessels. These hemorrhages are not preceded by excitement or by any signs of local determination. They are usually accompanied by paleness of the countenance; feeble pulse; fainting, &c. The indications of treatment will be:— to restore the action of the small vessels and the general tone of the system: hence the utility of stypties and cold externally; and of tonics and astringents, creasote, mineral acids, &c., internally. Hemorrhage also occurs from mechanical hyperæmia, as when hæmoptysis is produced by tubercles in the lungs; apoplexy by softening of the encephalic neurme; hæmatemesis by disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen, &c.

In Traumat'ic Hemorrhages, or those which are the consequences of wounds of arterial or venous trunks, the blood is of a florid red colour, and issues by jets and pulses, if it proceed from an artery; whilst it is of a deeper red, issues slowly and by a continuous flow, if from a vein. If the capillary vessels be alone divided, the blood is merely effused at the surface of the wound. Of the means used for arresting these traumatic hemorrhages, some act mechanically as absorbents, ligature, and compression; others chymically, as fire, caustic, creasote, astringents, &c.

HÆMORRHOID'AL, Hemorrhoid'al, Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Hæmorrhoï'deus. Relating to hemorrhoids; as hemorrhoidal flux, hemorrhoidal tumours, &c.

Hemorrhoidal Arteries have been distinguished into superior, middle, and inferior. The first is the termination of the inferior mesenteric artery, which assumes the name superior hemorrhoidal, when it reaches the upper and posterior part of the rectum. The middle hemorrhoidal is furnished by the hypogastric or internal pudic. It ramifies on the inferior and anterior part of the rectum. The inferior hemorrhoidal arteries are branches of the internal pudic, furnished to the inferior part of the rectum and to the muscles of the anus.

Hemorrhoidal Nerves. These emanate from the sciatic and hypogastric plexuses; and cover the rectum with their numerous filaments.

Hemorrhoidal Veins follow the same distribution, and generally empty themselves into the lesser mesenteric. Some of them assist in the formation of the hypogastric vein.

Hemorrhoidal Vessels, Vasa seda'lia, are those vessels which are distributed to the rectum —the seat of hemorrhoids.

HÆMOR'RHOÏS, Aimor'rhoïs, Asclepias'mus, (hæmo, and ῥεω, 'I flow.') Aimor'roïs, Practica Maris'ca, Maris'ca, Proctal'gia Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Morbus Hæmorrhoidalis, Hem'orrhoids, Piles, Em'erods, Em'eroids, Em'erandes, (F.) Hémorrhoïdes. The essential symptoms of this affection are:—Livid and painful tubercles or excrescences, (Hemorrhoid'al Tumours,) usually attended with a discharge of mucus or blood, (Hemorrhoidal flux, Hæmorrhag''ia proctica, Proctor'rhois, Hæmoproc'tia, Hæmorrhœ'a vaso'rum hæmorrhoïda'lium, (F.) Hémaproctie, Hémoproctie. The most common causes of piles are a sedentary life; accumulation of fæces in the rectum; violent efforts at stool; pregnancy, &c. The precursory symptoms are:—pains in the loins; stupor of the lower limbs; and uncasiness in the abdomen and rectum, with more or less gastric, cerebral, and indeed general disorder;—constituting the Diath'esis Hæmorrhoida'lis, Mo'tus seu Tur'ba Hæmorrhoida'lis, and Moli'men Hæmorrhoida'lē, of most of the writers of Continental Europe. To these symptoms follow one or more round, smooth, renitent, painful, pulsating, and erectile tumours, around the margin of the anus, or within the anus; some pouring out blood occasionally. After having remained, for a time, tense and painful, they gradually shrink and disappear. The chief symptoms, occasioned by hemorrhoidal tumours, when much inflamed, are;—constant pain, liable, however, to exacerbations, and to become augmented by the least pressure, or by the passage of the fæces, and obliging the patient to preserve the horizontal posture.

Hemorrhoids have generally been distinguished into —Hæmorrhoïdes Fluen'tes seu Marisco'sæ, Proc'tica Maris'ca cruen'ta, Bleed'ing or O'pen Piles; and into H. non fluen'tes, Proc'tica Maris'ca cæ'ca, Hæmorrhoïdes cæ'cæ seu furen'tes, Hæmorrhoida'les no'di, Shut or blind piles. They have, also, been divided into internal or occult', and external, according to their situation; and into accidental or constitutional.

Hemorrhoidal Tumours are extremely troublesome, by their disposition to frequent recurrence; and they are apt to induce fistula; otherwise, they are devoid of danger. When anatomically examined, they are found not to consist in a varicose dilatation of the veins of the rectum; but to be formed of a very close, spongy, texture; similar to that which surrounds the orifice of the vagina; and to be erectile, like it. They are surrounded by a delicate membrane, and have no internal cavity. The treatment, in mild cases of hemorrhoidal tumours, is simple. Rest; the horizontal posture; the use of mild laxatives, as sulphur, castor oil, and emollient glysters, will be sufficient. If they be much inflamed, leeches may be applied; and warm cataplasms or cold lotions, according to circumstances, be prescribed, with abstinence, and cooling drinks. Afterwards, an ointment, composed of powdered galls and opium, may afford relief. It is in the relaxed kind, that such ointment, and the internal use of Ward's Paste, can alone be expected to afford much benefit. If, after repeated attacks, the tumours remain hard and painful, and threaten fistula, they may be removed.

By Hemorrhoidal Flux, Fluxus hæmorrhoïda'lis, Proctorrhag''ia, is meant the hemorrhage which takes place from the rectum, owing to hemorrhoids. It is a common affection. The quantity of blood discharged is various; at times, it is very trifling; at others, sufficient to induce great debility, and even death. It is announced and accompanied by the same symptoms as precede and attend hemorrhoidal tumours. Like other hemorrhages, it may be active or passive, accidental or constitutional. The prognosis is rarely unfavourable. The affection may, almost always, be relieved by properly adapted means. These resemble such as are necessary in hemorrhages in general. Perfect quietude, mental and corporeal; light diet; cooling drinks; bleeding, if the symptoms indicate it; astringents, if the disease be protracted and passive, such as the Tinctura Ferri Chloridi; aspersions of cold water on the anus; astringent injections; plugging, and compression. Such will be the principal remedial agents. When the hemorrhage has become habitual, or is vicarious, some caution may be required in checking it; and, if inconvenience arise from a sudden suppression, its return may be solicited by the semicupium, sitting over warm water, aloetic purgatives, glysters, irritating suppositories, &c.; or leeches may be applied to the anus.

To the internal bleeding pile, a soft, red, strawberrylike elevation of the mucous membrane, Dr. Houston, of Dublin, gives the name vas'cular tumour. For its removal he recommends the application of nitric acid, so as to produce sloughing of its surface.

Some authors have described a species of Leucorrhœ'a Ana'lis, or whitish discharge from the anus, which often attends ordinary hemorrhoids. This they have called Proctica maris'ca muco'sa, Hæmor'rhoïs al'ba, Hæmorrhag''ia muco'sa, Leucor'rhoïs. It requires no special mention.

The term Hemorrhoid is applied at times to varicose veins developed elsewhere, as at the orifice of the uterus. See Metrærmorrhoïdes.

It has been so called, in consequence of the upper lip of the hare being thus divided. Harelip is generally congenital; at other times it is accidental, or produced by a wound, the edges of which have not been brought into contact, and have healed separately. It is simple, when there is but one division; double, when there are two; and complicated, when there is, at the same time, a division or cleft of the superior maxillary bone and of the palate—Cleft or fis'sured palate, Wolf's jaw, Pala'tum fissum, Rictus lupi'nus; or a projection of the teeth into the separation of the lip.

In the Harelip operation, there are two indications to be fulfilled. First, to pare, with the knife or scissors, the edges of the cleft, and, afterwards, to preserve them in contact; in order to cause adhesion. This last object is accomplished by means of pins, passed through the edges of the division; in other words, by the twisted suture. The projecting teeth must, of course, be previously removed. If there be separation of the palate, it will become less and less after the union of the lip, or the operation of staphylorraphy may be performed upon it.

HEART, (Sax. heopt, (G.) Herz,) Cor, Cear, Cer, Car'dia, (F.) Cœur. An azygous muscle, of an irregularly pyramidal shape; situate obliquely and a little to the left side, in the chest;—resting on the diaphragm by one of its surfaces;—suspended by its base from the great vessels; free and movable in the rest of its extent, and surrounded by the pericardium. The right side of the body of the heart is thin and sharp, and is called Margo acu'tus: the left is thick and round, and termed Margo obtu'sus. It is hollow within, and contains four cavities; two of which, with thinner and less fleshy walls, receive the blood from the lungs and the rest of the body; and pour it into two others, with thick and very fleshy parietes, which send it to the lungs and to every part of the body. Of these cavities, the former are called auricles, the latter ventricles. The right auricle and right ventricle form the Pulmo'ic or right or anterior heart, Cor veno'sum seu pulmona'lē, (F.) Cœur du poumon, C. du sang noir, C. droit, C. antérieur: and the left auricle and ventricle, the system'ic, corporeal, left, or aortic heart, Cor arterio'sum seu aor'ticum, (F.) Cœur du corps, C. gauche, C. cortique ou C. rouge. In the adult, these are totally distinct from each other, being separated by a partition:—the septum cordis. Into the right auricle, the venæ cavæ,—superior and inferior,—and the coronary vein, open. The pulmonary artery arises from the right ventricle (see Conus arteriosus): the four pulmonary veins open into the left auricle, and the aorta arises from the left ventricle.

The mean weight of the heart, in the adult, from the twenty-fifth to the sixtieth year, is, according to Bouillaud, from eight to nine ounces. The dimensions, according to Lobstein and Bouillaud, are as follows:—Length, from base to apex, five inches six lines; breadth, at the base, three inches; thickness of the walls of the left ventricle, seven lines; at a finger's breadth above the apex, four lines; thickness of the walls of the right ventricle, two and a quarter lines; at the apex, half a line; thickness of right auricle, one line; of the left auricle, half a line. The heart is covered, externally, by a very thin, membranous reflection from the pericardium. The muscular structure of which it is constituted is much thicker in the parietes of the ventricle than in those of the auricles. Its cavities are lined by a very delicate membrane, the endocar'dium, which is continuous with the inner membrane of the arteries, as regards the left cavities, and with that of the veins, as regards the right. Its arteries—the coronary—arise from the commencement of the aorta. Its nerves proceed, chiefly, from the pneumogastric and the cervical ganglions of the great sympathetic. The heart is the great agent in the circulation. By its contraction, the blood is sent over every part of the body. Its action does not seem to be directly owing to nervous influence received from the brain or spinal marrow, or from both. The circulation may, indeed, be kept up for some time, if both brain and spinal marrow be destroyed.

When the ear is applied to the chest, a dull, lengthened sound is heard, which is synchronous with the arterial pulse. This is instantly succeeded by a sharp, quick sound, like that of the valve of a bellows or the lapping of a dog, and this is followed by a period of repose. The first sound appears to be mainly produced by the contraction of the ventricles; the second, by the reflux of the blood against the semilunar valves. These are what are called the Sounds of the Heart, Cardiche'mata, Son'itus cordis seu cardi'aci. (F.) Bruits du Cœur. Dr. C. J. B. Williams suggests the word lubb-dup as conveying a notion of the two sounds. The Beating or Impulse of the heart, Heart-stroke, Apex beat, Pulsus seu Ictus cordis, (F.) Impulsion du Cœur, against the parietes of the chest, is mainly caused by the systole of the heart, which tends to project it forwards. It is doubted, however, by some, whether the impulsion is produced by the dilatation or the contraction of the ventricles.

The following table exhibits the different actions of the heart, and their coincidence with its sounds and impulse. It presumes, that the period from the commencement of one pulsation to that of another is divided into eight parts; and if the case of a person, whose pulse beats sixty times in a minute, be taken, each of these parts will represent the eighth of a second.

Eighths of a Second.
Last part of the pause	1	Auricles contracting; ventricles distended.
First sound and impulse	4	Ventricles contracting; auricles dilating.
Second sound	2	Ventricles dilating; auricles dilating.
Pause	1	Ventricles dilating; auricles distended.

The heart is subject to different organic diseases; the chief of which are aneurism, contraction of the apertures, and rupture of its parietes.

Heart, At'rophy of the, Atroph'ia seu Ari-du'ra seu Phthi'sis Cor'dis, Cardiatroph'ia, Acardiotroph'ia. A condition of the organ in which there is diminution in the thickness of the parietes of the whole organ.

The physical signs which indicate it are the following. In cases of long standing, the præcordial region is generally prominent; the pulsations of the heart are visible over a greater extent than natural; and a marked vibration is communicated to the hand when placed on the cardiac region. The dull sound on percussion is more extensive than natural; and on auscultation there is a permanent increase of the force and extent of the heart's action; there is no increase, however, of frequency, and the rhythm is regular. The pulse is generally strong, full, and hard.

Heart, Concentric Hypertrophy of the, (F.) Hypertrophie concentrique, Hypertrophie centripète du Cœur, Retrait ventriculaire, Cardiarctie, is when the parietes augment at the expense of the cavities.

Heart, Hypertrophy with Dilatation of the, Active aneurism, Eccentric hypertrophy. In this affection, the pulsations can be seen and felt over a larger space, and the apex is more to the left and lower down than natural. The impulse is less steady, but at times more violent than that which accompanies simple hypertrophy. Percussion gives more distinct evidence of the enlargement, the sound being more extensively dull. On auscultation, the impulse is often violent, but irregular; in extreme cases, it produces the sensation of a large mass of flesh rolling or revolving beneath the ear. The pulse is strong, full, and vibratory. The shock of the heart's action is often transmitted to the whole person, and to the bed on which the patient is lying.

HEAT, (past participle of Sax. hæτan, 'to make warm.') Calor, Ther'ma. (F.) Chaleur. The material cause, which produces the sensation — or the particular sensation itself — produced by a body of an elevated temperature, on our organs, especially on the organs of touch. Modern chymists have given the name Calor'ic to the principle, whatever may be its nature, which is the cause of heat. When we touch a body of a temperature superior to our own, a portion of caloric passes from the body to the hand, and produces the sensation of heat. If, on the contrary, we touch a body of a temperature inferior to our own, we communicate a portion of our caloric to it, and experience the sensation of cold. Our own sensations are but imperfect indexes of temperature. Two men meeting at the middle of a mountain,—the one ascending, the other descending,—will experience different sensations. The one ascending, passes from a warmer to a colder atmosphere;—the one descending from a colder to a warmer.

The chief instrument for measuring heat, used in medicine, is the thermometer. Of this there are three kinds:—that of Fahrenheit, that of Réaumur, and that of Celsius or the Centigrade.

To reduce Centigrade degrees to those of Fahrenheit, multiply by 9, divide by 5, and add 32: thus, 40° Cent. × 9 ÷ 5 + 32 = 104° Fah. To reduce Fahrenheit's degrees to those of Centigrade, subtract 32, multiply by 5, and divide by 9: thus, 104° Fah. — 32 × 5 ÷ 9 = 40° Cent. To reduce Réaumur's degrees to those of Fahrenheit, multiply by 9, divide by 4, and add 32: thus, 32° Réaum. × 9 ÷ 32 = 104° Fah. To reduce Fahrenheit's degrees to those of Réaumur, subtract 32, multiply by 4, and divide by 9: thus, 104° Fah. — 32 × 4 ÷ 9 = 32 Réaum. To reduce Réaumur's degrees to those of Centigrade, multiply by 5, and divide by 4; thus 32° Réaum. × 5 ÷ 4 = 40° Cent.; and, lastly, to reduce Centigrade degrees to those of Réaumur, multiply by 4, and divide by 5; thus, 40° Cent. × 4 ÷ 5 = 32° Réaum.

By the term gentle heat, Ph. U. S., 1863, is meant any temperature between 90° and 100°.

The normal temperature of the body may be regarded as on the average, from 98° to 100° or upwards. The blood of the right side of the heart is slightly hotter than that of the left; and the highest temperature observed is where the suprahepatic veins empty their blood into the vena cava ascendens. See Animal heat.

The human body can bear a high degree of heat diffused in the atmosphere. There are cases on record, where air of 400° and upwards, of Fahrenheit's scale, has been breathed with impunity for a short time. It can likewise withstand very severe cold. In the expedition of Capt. Back to the Arctic regions, the thermometer was as low as — 70° of Fahr., and Sir George Simpson affirms, that it has fallen in Siberia to — 83°, or 115° below the freezing point. Dr. Kane, in the Arctic regions, in 1853–54, observed the range of eleven spirit thermometers, selected as standards, to vary from—60° to—75°. The mean annual temperature was 5°.2, the lowest ever registered.

Excessive heat disposes the body to gastric and intestinal diseases, and particularly to inflammation and enlargement of the liver; hence, the frequency of such affections within the torrid zone. Heat is often used therapeutically; the actual cautery, at a white heat, disorganizes the parts to which it is applied: a lesser degree occasions violent inflammation. Heat higher than that of the human body is excitant: of a lower degree, sedative. Excessive cold acts as a powerful sedative —inducing sleep, the tendency to which, after long exposure, becomes irresistible. Many of the topical applications — as cataplasms — act wholly by virtue of their warmth and moisture.

Heat, Ar'dor vene'reus, Pruri'tus, (F.) Chaleurs, Chaleurs des Animaux, Folie, Rut, is the periodical sexual desire experienced by animals, — Œstrua'tion. It is supposed by some to be owing to the periodical maturation and discharge of ova,— Ovula'tion.

M. Double has used the term septic heat, (F.) Chaleur septique, for that which produces a pungent sensation on the hand, similar to that of acrid heat, but milder and more uniform, and which is accompanied with feebleness and frequency of pulse, &c.

Müller, are short vessels given off from the larger branches, as well as from the finest twigs of the artery of the organ: most of those come off at a right angle, and project into the cavity of the spongy substance, either terminating abruptly or swelling out into a club-like process without again subdividing. Almost all these vessels are bent like a horn, so that the end describes half a circle or somewhat more. They have a great resemblance to the tendrils of the vine, whence their name. A minute examination of them, either with the lens or the microscope, shows that, although they at all times project into the venous cavities of the corpora cavernosa, they are not entirely naked, but are covered with a delicate membrane, which, under the microscope, appears granular.

HEPATIC AR'TERY, Arte'ria Hepat'ica. One of the three branches given off by the cœliac. It passes towards the inferior surface of the liver; where it divides into two branches, a right and a left, which proceed towards the corresponding parts of that organ. It may be seated either in the peritoneal covering, Sc'rohepati'tis, Hepati'tis velamento'sa seu extern'a, Peritoni'tis hepat'ica, Perihepati'tis; or in the substance of the liver, Hepati'tis parenchymato'sa; or in both, Purohepati'tis, and may be acute or chronic. The peculiar symptoms are:—pain in the right hypochondrium, shooting to the back and right shoulder, and increased on pressure; difficulty of lying on the left side; sometimes jaundice with cough, and synocha. Its termination is generally by resolution:—in tropical climates it often runs on to suppuration, Jec'oris vom'ica, Hepati'tis apostemato'sa, the abscess breaking either externally, or forming a communication with the intestines or chest, or breaking into the cavity of the abdomen. The causes are those of inflammation in general. Heat predisposes to it; hence its greater frequency in hot climates. On dissection of those who have died of it, the liver has been found hard and enlarged; colour of a deep purple; or the membranes have been more or less vascular; or adhesions, or tubercles, or hydatids, or abscesses, or biliary calculi may be met with. The treatment must be bold. Bleeding, general and local, fomentations, blisters, purgatives, and the antiphlogistic regimen. In hot climates especially, a new action must be excited by mercury as early as possible.

It may be suspected from the existence of the symptoms above mentioned, when in a minor degree; enlargement, constant dull pain in the region of the liver; sallow countenance; higheolored urine; claycolored fæces, &c. The great object of treatment is to excite a new action by mercury and counter-irritants, and to keep the liver free by cathartics.

Sauvages has distinguished two species of hepatocele:—the ventral (in the linea alba), and the umbilical or hepatomph'alum.

An epithet given to diseases, communicated from progenitors. This communication is termed, by the French, Hérédité. Such diseases may exist at birth; or they may supervene at a more or less advanced period of existence. Hereditary diseases, Morbi heredita'rii, (F.) Maladies héréditaires, often prevail amongst several members of a family, or are family diseases or complaints.

HÉRÉDITÉ, see Hereditary.

HERMAPHRODE'ITY, Hermaphrodis'ia, Hermaphroditis'mus, Hermaphrodis'mus, Fab'rica androg''yna, Androgyn'ia, Gynan'dria, Hermaph'rodism, Hermaph'roditism; (from 'Ερμης, 'Mercury,' and Αφροδιτη, 'Venus.') Appertaining to Mercury and Venus. Union of the two sexes in the same individual.

HERMAPHRODISIA, Hermaphrodeity.

HERMAPH'RODITE. Hermaphrodi'tus, Gy'nida, Androg''ynus, (Sc.) Scarcht, (Prov.) Scrat. One who possesses the attributes of male and female: who unites in himself the two sexes. A term, applied to an animal or plant which is, at the same time, both male and female. True hermaphrodites are only met with in the lower degrees of the animal scale, amongst the zoophytes, mollusca, or gasteropoda. The individuals of the human species, regarded as hermaphrodites, owe this appearance to a vicious conformation of the genital organs; a kind of monstrosity, which renders them unfit for generation, although an attentive examination may exhibit the true sex. Hermaphrodites have, likewise, been described, which, instead of uniting the attributes of both sexes, cannot be considered male or female. These have been called neut'ral hermaph'rodites.

HERMAPHRODIT'IC, Hermaphrodit'icus, Androg''ynous, (F.) Hermaphroditique. Relating or appertaining to an hermaphrodite.

HERMODAC'TYLUS, Dactyle'tus, An'ima articulo'rum, ('Ερμης, 'Mercury,' and δακτυλος, 'a finger;' or rather from' Hermus, a river in Asia, upon whose banks it grows, and δακτυλος, 'a date;' or from 'Ερμης, 'Mercury,' and δακτυλος, 'a date;') (F.) Hermodactyle, Hermodacte ou Hermodate. The root of the Hermodac'tyl was formerly used as a cathartic. By some, it is supposed to be identical with the Iris tubero'sa. The best testimony seems to be in favour of its being a variety of the colchicum,—Col'chicum Illyr'icum. Under the name Hermodactyls, roots or bulbs of an unknown plant, growing in the countries about the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, are sold in the shops of Europe.

HERMODATE, Hermodactylus.

HERMOPH'ILUS, ('Ερμης, 'Mercury,' and φιλος, 'a lover.') One who is fond of mercury as a medicine.

HER'NIA, (from 'ερνος, a sprout, 'a shoot,' [?]), Ra'mex, Ruptu'ra, R. hernio'sa, Crepatu'ra, Ectop'ia hernio'sa, Ce'lē, Rup'ture Burst, (F.) Hernie, Hargne, Descente, Effort, Greveure, Rompeure. Any tumour, formed by the displacement of a viscus or a portion of a viscus, which has escaped from its natural cavity by some aperture, and projects externally. Herniæ have been divided into,—1. Hernia of the Brain; Encephalocele; 2. Hernia of the Thorax; Pneumoccle; 3. Hernia of the Abdomen.

Abdom'inal Herniæ are remarkable for their frequency, variety, and the danger attending them. They are produced by the protrusion of the viscera, contained in the abdomen, through the natural or accidental apertures in the parietes of that cavity. The organs, which form them most frequently, are the intestines and the epiploon. These herniæ have been divided, according to the apertures by which they escape, into:

1. In'guinal or Suprapu'bian Herniæ. These issue by the inguinal canal: they are called Bubonoce'lē, when small; and Scro'tal Hernia or Oscheoce'lē, in man, when they descend into the scrotum:—Vul'var Hernia or Puden'dal or La'bial Hernia, Episioce'lē, in women, when they extend to the labia majora. 2. Cru'ral or Fem'oral Hernia, Me'roce'lē, when they issue by the crural canal. 3. Infrapu'bian Hernia, (F.) Hernie sous-pubienne, Oödeoce'lē, Opeoce'lē, Opodeoce'lē, Her'nia foram'inis ova'lis seu obturato'ria, when the viscera escape through the opening, which gives passage to the infra-pubian vessels. 4. Ischiat'ic or Sciat'ic Hernia; when it takes place through the sacro-sciatic notch. 5. Umbil'ical Hernia, Exom'phalos, Omphaloce'lē; when it occurs at the umbilicus or near it. 6. Epigas'tric Hernia;—occurring through the linea alba, above the umbilicus. 7. Hypogastric or Infraümbil'ical Hernia, Cœlioce'lē, Hypogastroce'lē,—when it occurs through the linea alba below the umbilicus. 8. Perine'al Her'nia, Mesoscelocel'lē, Hernia perinæ'i, Perinæoce'le, Perineoce'lē,—when it takes place through the levator ani, and appears at the perineum. 9. Vag''inal Hernia, Coleoce'lē seu Elytroce'lē—through the parietes of the vagina. 10. Diaphragmat'ic Hernia, Diaphragmatoce'lē; when it passes through the diaphragm.

Herniæ are likewise distinguished,—according to the viscera forming them,—into Enteroce'lē, Epiploce'lē, En'teroëpiploce'lē, Gastroce'lē, Cystoce'lē, Hepatoce'lē, Splenoce'lē, &c.

When a hernia can be restored to its natural cavity, by the aid of pressure, &c., properly applied, it is said to be redu'cible. It is, on the contrary, irredu'cible, when adhesion, bulk, &c., oppose its return. When the aperture, which has given passage to the hernia, occasions more or less constriction of the protruded portion, the hernia is said to be incar'cerated or stran'gulated; and, if the constriction be not removed, constipation, hiccough, vomiting, and all the signs of violent inflammation, followed by gangrene, supervene, with alteration of the features, small pulse, cold extremities, and death.

The therapeutical indications are,—1. As regards reducible hernia:—to replace the viscera in the abdomen by the taxis; and to retain them there by the use of a truss, which, if properly adapted, may effect a radical cure. 2. As regards irreducible hernia:—to support the tumour by an appropriate suspensory bandage. 3. As regards strangulated hernia:—to have recourse to the taxis; bloodletting; warm bath; tobacco glysters; ice to the tumour; and, if these should not succeed, to perform an operation, which consists in dividing the covering of the hernia, and cutting the aponeurotic ring, which causes the strangulation;—reducing the displaced viscera, unless their diseased condition should require them to be retained without;—dressing the wound appropriately:—restoring the course of the fæces by means of gentle glysters—preventing or combating inflammation of the abdominal viscera;—conducting the wound to cicatrization, by appropriate means; and afterwards supporting the cicatrix by a bandage.

The word hernia was also used, of old, for the scrotum, and, not unfrequently, for the testicle.

It is a disease which cannot be mistaken, and the treatment must obviously be strongly antiphlogistic, supporting the testicle during the treatment, and for some time afterwards; methodical compression has also been found useful. The disease is not generally of a serious character, going off as suddenly as it comes on. As it affects the epididymis more especially, when supervening on gonorrhœa or blennorrhœa, it is sometimes termed blennorrhag''ic epididymi'tis.

HER'PES, gen. Herpe'tis, (ἑρπης, genitive, ἑρπητος,) Erpes, Herpe'don, Her'pen, Ser'pens, (ἑρπω, 'I creep;' because it creeps and spreads about the skin;) Ec'phlysis Her'pes, Cytis'ma Her'pes, Olophlyc'tis, Tet'ter, Fret, (F.) Herpès, Dartre. A vesicular disease, which, in most of its forms, passes through a regular course of increase, maturation, decline, and termination, in from 10 to 14 days. The vesicles arise in distinct, but irregular clusters, which commonly appear in quick succession, and near together, on an inflamed base; generally attended with heat, pain, and considerable constitutional disorder. The term, like most others which refer to cutaneous diseases, has not been accurately defined. The ancients had three varieties: the mil'iary, κεγχριαιος; vesic'ular, φλυκταινωδης, and ero'ding, εσθιομενος. Bateman has the following varieties: 1. HERPES PHLYCTÆNO'DES, Her'pes milia'ris, Ec'phlysis Her'pes Milia'ris, Nirles, (F.) Dartre phlyctenoïde, in which the vesicles are millet-sized; pellucid; clusters commencing on an uncertain part of the body, and being progressively strewed over the rest of the surface; succeeded by fresh crops. 2. HERPES ZOS'TER, Zos'ter, Zo'na ig'nea seu serpigino'sa, Ig'nis Per'sicus, Cinzill'a, Cin'gulum, Sa'cer ig'nis, Ec'phlysis Her'pes zos'ter, Her'pes peris'celis, Erysip'elas zos'ter seu phlyctænoï'des seu pustulo'sa, Zo'na, Cir'cinus, Perizo'ma, (F.) Ceinture, C. dartreuse, Feu Persique, Erysipèle pustuleux, Shingles, (Prov.) Cruels, in which the vesicles are pearl-sized; the clusters spreading round the body like a girdle; at times confluent, and occasionally preceded by constitutional irritation. 3. HERPES CIRCINA'TUS, Formi'ca ambulato'ria, An'nulus re'pens, Her'pes Serpi'go, Serpi'go, Ec'phlysis Her'pes Circina'tus, Ring'-worm, Vesic'ular Ring'worm, (F.) Herpès circiné, consisting of vesicles with a reddish base, uniting in rings; the area of the rings slightly discoloured, often followed by fresh crops. 4. HERPES LABIA'LIS, and 5. HERPES PRÆPUTIA'LIS, Aph'thæ præpu'tii, Ulcus'cula præpu'tii, appearing, respectively, on the lips and prepuce. 6. HERPES I'RIS, Iris, Rainbow worm, occurring in small circular patches, each of which is composed of concentric rings of different colours. To these may be added, HERPES EX'EDENS, H. esthiom'enus seu depas'cens seu fe'rus seu œstiom'enus seu fe'rox, Ec'phlysis Her'pes ex'edens, Dar'ta excoriati'va seu malig'na, Lu'pus non ex'edens, Vitili'go (?), Leucē (?), Formi'ca corrosi'va, For'mix, Pap'ula fe'ra, Ul'cerative Ring'worm, A'gria, (F.) Dartre rongeante, in which the vesicles are hard; clusters thronged; fluid dense, yellow or reddish, hot, acrid, corroding the subjacent skin, and spreading in serpentine trails.

All the varieties demand simply an antiphlogistic treatment, when attended with febrile irritation. The herpes circinatus, alone, requires the use of astringent applications which have the power of repressing the eruption.

In the United States, H. dec'ora is used. The leech lives in fresh water, and feeds on the blood of animals, which it sucks, after having pierced the skin with its three sharp teeth. This habit has been taken advantage of to produce local bloodletting. In applying the leech, the part must be wiped dry; and if there be difficulty in making it suck, a little milk or cream may be applied. When satiated, it will drop off, and by applying a little salt or vinegar to its head it will disgorge the blood. HO'MO, gen. Hom'inis, (F.) Homme, Man,—the chief and most perfect of the mammalia; in Greek, ανθρωπος, Anthro'pos, from ανα, 'upwards,' and τρεπω, 'I turn;' because man, alone, of all animals, possesses the natural power of standing erect. He is also the only animal whose incisor teeth, wedged in a projecting jaw, are absolutely vertical. Man is especially distinguished from other mammalia by the faculty which he possesses of classing his ideas; comparing them with each other; and connecting, representing, and transmitting them by signs and articulate sounds. He possesses in the highest degree all the attributes of intelligence — memory, judgment, and imagination. He inhabits all countries—the burning regions of the torrid zone, and the chilling atmosphere of the polar climes. In different situations he presents in his figure, colour and stature, differences which have caused mankind to be divided by naturalists into races or varieties. The number of such races can only be approximated. Blumenbach admits five—the Caucasian, Ethiopian, Mongolian, Malay, and American. Every division must necessarily be arbitrary, and the individuals composing each variety are far from being alike.

A fanciful doctrine, which maintains that disordered actions in the human body are to be cured by inducing other disordered actions of a like kind [similia similibus], and this to be accomplished by infinitesimally small doses, often of apparently inert agents: the decillionth part of a grain of charcoal, for example, is an authorized dose. It has also been called Glob'ulism.

So long ago as in the writings of Gregory the Great, there is the following remark: "Mos medicinæ est ut aliquando similia similibus, aliquando contraria contrariis curet. Nam sæpe calida calidis, frigida frigidis, sæpe autem frigida calidis, calida frigidis sanare consuevit."

The gangrene then manifests itself. It extends from the centre of the ulcerated surface towards the edges; these become swollen, painful, and everted; and the patient dies with all the signs of typhus. The treatment must be varied according to circumstances. Sometimes, it requires the use of stimulating, acid, caustic, and antiseptic applications; with, occasionally, the actual cautery, aided by the exhibition of tonics, internally:—at others, the antiphlogistic regimen and emollient applications may be necessary.

This name was long given to every encysted tumour which contained an aqueous and transparent fluid. Many pathologists subsequently applied it to vesicles, softer than the tissue of membranes, more or less transparent, which are developed within organs, but without adhering to their tissues. It is by no means clear that these formations are really entozoa. They have been found in various parts of the body; sometimes in the uterus, occasioning signs nearly similar to those of pregnancy, but being sooner or later expelled. The expulsion is generally attended with more or less hemorrhage. See Acephalocyst.

This oxide is made in various ways. It may be formed by boiling submuriate of mercury in lime water. The dose of this Pul'vis Hydrar'gyri cine'reus is from two to ten grains. There are four other preparations of it in estimation, viz:—Plenck's solu'tion, made by rubbing mercury with mucilage. 2. By rubbing equal parts of sugar and mercury together. 3. A compound of honey or liquorice and purified mercury. 4. The blue pill, and blue ointment. All these possess the usual properties of mercury.

Dissolve the potassa in the water, allow the dregs to subside, and pour off the clear solution. To this add the chloride, and stir constantly till the black oxide is formed. Pour off the supernatant liquor, wash the black oxide with distilled water, and dry with a gentle heat. Dose, one or two grains.

Boil the mercury with the sulphuric acid until the sulphate of mercury is left dry. Rub this, when cold, with the chloride of sodium, in an earthenware mortar; then sublime with a gradually increasing heat.—Ph. U. S.) It is used as an antisyphilitic eutrophic in venereal complaints, old cutaneous affections, &c. Gr. iij to Oj of water is a good gargle in venereal sorethroat, or as an injection in gonorrhœa. Externally, it is applied in cases of tetter, and to destroy fungus, or stimulate old ulcers. Dose, gr. 1-16 to gr. 1-8, in pill, once in twenty-four hours. White of egg is the best antidote to it, when taken in an overdose.

S. g., when liquid, 13.568 (Cavendish); easily oxydized. Metallic quicksilver does not act on the body, when taken into the stomach; but if oxydized, and combined with acids, it acts powerfully. It has been exhibited in cases of constriction of the bowels and in intussusception, from a notion that it must certainly pass through the bowels by its gravity. The water, in which mercury has been boiled, has been recommended as a vermifuge; but probably enjoys no such property, as chemical tests do not exhibit the presence of the metal. It is somewhat uncertain; and consequently not much employed as a mercurial. It possesses the properties of the black oxide of mercury, and may be advantageously exhibited in cases of diarrhœa in children, dependent upon acidity and vitiated secretions. Dose, gr. v to ℥ss, twice a day, in any viscid substance.

A term generally applied to a collection of serous fluid in the areolar texture of the scrotum or in some of the coverings, either of the testicle or spermatic cord. To the first of these varieties the names — Exter'nal Hy'drocele, H. œdemato'des, (F.) H. par infiltration have been given; and to the second, those of Hydroce'lē inter'na, H. tu'nicæ vagina'lis tes'tis, Hydrel'ytron, (F.) H. par épanchement. When the collection occurs in the envelope of the testicle, it is called H. of the tu'nica vagina'lis; and the epithet congen'ital is added, when the interior of the membrane, in which it is situate, still communicates freely with the cavity of the abdomen. When it exists in the spermatic chord, it is called encyst'ed, or diffused Hy'drocele of the spermat'ic cord, as the case may be. The tumour of the distended scrotum is oblong; greater below than above; indolent and semi-transparent. When it becomes inconveniently large, the fluid may be evacuated by puncturing with a trocar, but, as it collects again, this operation can only be considered palliative. The radical cure consists, usually, in injecting some irritating liquid through the canula of the trocar, which has been left in after puncturing. This is kept in the tunica vaginalis for a few minutes, and then withdrawn. The coat inflames; adhesion takes place, and the cavity is obliterated.

Hydrocephalus Chron'icus, Hydrencephaloce'lē, Hy'drops Cap'itis, seu arachnoïdeæ, Hydrocephalus exter'nus, (F.) Hydrocéphale, Hydrocéphaloëctasie of some, may exist at birth. Hydrenceph'alon, Hydroceph'alus congen'itus seu adna'tus commonly commences at an early period of existence, and the accumulation of fluid gradually produces distension of the brain, and of the skull, with separation of the sutures. It commonly proves fatal before puberty.

Hydrocephalus Congenitus, see H. chronicus.

Hydrocephalus Externus, Œde'ma cap'itis, Cephalœde'ma of some, is a mere infiltration into the subcutaneous cellular tissue of the cranium. See Hydrocephalus chronicus.

It is observed particularly in childhood. Its march is extremely acute and often very rapid; admitting, generally, however, of division into three stages. The symptoms of the first stage are those of general febrile irritation, with headache, intolerance of light and sound, delirium, &c. Those of the second, which generally denote that the inflammation has ended in effusion, are, great slowness of pulse, crying out as if in distress, moaning, dilated pupil, squinting, &c.; and lastly, in the third stage—profound stupor, paralysis, convulsions, involuntary evacuations, quick pulse, and frequently death. The disease is of uncertain duration; sometimes, destroying in two or three days; at others, extending to two or three weeks. The prognosis is unfavourable. The treatment must be active during the stage of excitement,—precisely that which is necessary in phrenitis. In the second stage, the indication is;—to promote the absorption of the effused fluid. This must be done by counter-irritants, and mercury, chiefly. On dissection, water is generally found in the ventricles, or at the base of the brain; or there are evidences of previous vascular excitement, as effusions of coagulable lymph, &c.

When the effusion occurs suddenly, either primarily, or secondarily in the course of some other disease, it has been termed, by the Germans, Wasserschlag, Water Stroke.

sique. This acid exists in a great variety of native combinations in the vegetable kingdom, and imparts to them certain properties, which have been long known and esteemed; as in the bitter almond, cherry laurel, leaves of the peach tree, kernels of fruit, pips of apples, &c. When concentrated, it is liquid, colourless, of a strong smell and taste, at first cool, afterwards burning. Its s. g. at 7° Centigrade, is 0.7058. It is very volatile, and enters into ebullition at 80° Fah. It speedily undergoes decomposition, sometimes in less than an hour, and consists of a peculiar gaseous and highly-inflammable compound of carbon and nitrogen, to which the name Cyan'ogen has been assigned; and of hydrogen, which acts as the acidifying principle: hence its name Hydrocyanic acid. In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, (1851 and 1863,) two formulæ for the preparation of the Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum dilu'tum—Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum, Ph. U. S. of 1842—are given; the one from the Ferrocyanide of Potassium; the other from the Cyanide of Silver. Both of these as well as the Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum dilu'tum of the British Pharmacopœia (1863), contain 2 per cent. of the anhydrous acid. According to Magendie, the acid, prepared after Scheele's method—the one in common use—is of irregular medicinal power: he, therefore, recommends Gay Lussac's acid, diluted with six times its volume, or 8.5 times its weight of distilled water, for medicinal purposes, and this he calls Medic''inal Prussic Acid. Dr. Ure has proposed, that the specific gravity should indicate that which is proper for medicinal exhibition; and, after experiments of the specific gravity of the acids obtained by different processes, he states, that the acid, usually prescribed, is of s. g. 0.996 or 0.997. Great caution is, however, necessary. One drop of pure prussic acid may instantly destroy, and the animal show hardly any traces of irritability, a few moments after death. It has been advised in laryngeal phthisis, in pulmonary phthisis, pulmonary inflammation and irritation, dyspepsia, uterine affections, hectic cough, cancer, chronic rheumatism, and mania, and as a local remedy in impetiginous affections; but, although possessed of powerful sedative properties, it is so unmanageable and the preparation so uncertain, that it is not much used. The Dose of Scheele's Acid, or of the Medicinal Prussic Acid, is from a quarter of a drop to two drops.

This is not a common disease. Palpitations; irregular or intermitting pulse; excessive dyspnœa, amounting often to orthopnœa, and dulness over a large space on percussion, will cause the pericardium to be suspected. The treatment is that of dropsies in general. It is, usually, however, of the active kind.

The term Ra'bies is more appropriate for the aggregate of symptoms resulting from the bite of rabid animals. Hydrophobia literally signifies a 'dread of water;' and consequently, ought to be applied to one of the symptoms of rabies, rather than to the disease itself. It is a symptom which appears occasionally in other nervous affections. Rabies is susceptible of spontaneous development in the dog, wolf, cat, and fox, which can thence transmit it to other quadrupeds or to man; but it has not been proved that it can supervene,—without their having been previously bitten,—in animals of other species; or that the latter can, when bitten, communicate it to others. Many facts induce the belief, that the saliva and bronchial mucus are the sole vehicles of the rabid virus; the effects of which upon the economy sometimes appear almost immediately after the bite, and are, at others, apparently dormant for a considerable period. The chief symptoms are—a sense of dryness and constriction of the throat; excessive thirst; difficult deglutition; aversion for, and horror at, the sight of liquids as well as of brilliant objects: red, animated countenance; great nervous irritability; frothy saliva; grinding of the teeth, &c. Death most commonly happens before the fifth day. Hydrophobia has hitherto resisted all therapeutical means. Those which allay irritation are obviously most called for. In the way of prevention, the bitten part should always be excised, where practicable; and cauterized.

In some cases, symptoms like those which follow the bite of a rabid animal are said to have come on spontaneously. This affection has been termed nervous or spontaneous hydrophobia.

HYDROPHTHAL'MIA, (hydro, and ὀφθαλμος, 'the eye.') Hydrophthal'mus, Drop'sy of the eye, Hy'drops Oc'uli, Buphthal'mus, Zoöphthal'mus, Oc'ulus Bovi'nus seu Bu'bulus seu Elephan'tinus, Ophthalmopto'sis, Parop'sis Staphylo'ma sim'plex, (F.) Hydrophthalmie, Hydropisie de l'œil. This affection is caused, at times, by an increase in the quantity of the aqueous, at others, of the vitreous, humour. In the former case, the iris is concave anteriorly, and pushed backwards:—in the latter, it is convex, and pushed forwards. Most commonly, the disease seems to depend on both humours at the same time. Hydrophthalmia sometimes affects both eyes; at others, only one. Children are more exposed to it than adults or old persons. The treatment must vary according to the cause; its longer or shorter duration; greater or less extent, &c. Hence, according to circumstances, hydragogue medicines, purgatives, general and local blood-letting, blisters, setons, moxa, cupping-glasses, fomentations, collyria, and fumigations of different kinds, have been employed. When all means fail, and the disease continues to make progress, the fluid may be evacuated by a puncture made with a cataract needle at the lower part of the transparent cornea.

HYDROP'OTA, Hydrop'otes, (ὑδροποτης, from hydro, and ποτης, 'a drinker.') Pota'tor Aquæ, A water drinker. One who drinks only water, or drinks it in an extraordinary quantity.

HY'DROPS, gen. Hydro'pis, (ὑδρωψ, from ὑδωρ, 'water,') Phlegma'tia, Hy'deros, Hyderi'asis, Affec'tus hydero'des, Hydrop'isis, Hydropisi'a, Hydropis'mus, Hydrop'sia, Hydrorrhœ'a, Hydror'rhoē, Hydror'rhoïs, Polyhy'dria, Hydrou'sus, Hydrou'sis, Drop'sy, (Old Eng.) Drop'yk, (F.) Hydropisie. A preternatural collection of a serous fluid in any cavity of the body, or in the areolar texture. When the areolar texture of the whole body is more or less filled with fluid, the disease is called Anasar'ca or Leucophlegma'tia; — and when this variety is local or partial, it is called Œde'ma. The chief dropsies, designated from their seat, are:—Anasarca, Hydrocephalus, Hydrorachitis, Hydrothorax, Hydropericardium, Ascites, Hydrometra, Hydrocele, &c.

Encyst'ed Drop'sy, Hy'drops sacca'tus, incarcera'tus seu cyst'icus, is that variety in which the fluid is enclosed in a sac or cyst; so that it has no communication with the surrounding parts. Dropsy of the Ovarium, Hydrops seu Asci'tes Ova'rii, Asci'tes sacca'tus, is an instance of this variety.

Dropsy may be active or passive. The former consists in an increased action of the exhalants, so that those vessels pour out much more fluid than is absorbed: the latter arises from a state of atony of the absorbent vessels, which allows of an accumulation of fluid. It may also be mechanical, or produced by obstructions to the circulation, as in cases of diseased liver. Active dropsy, occurring accidentally in a sound individual, generally ends favourably. That which supervenes on other diseases, or is symptomatic of some internal affection, is rarely curable.

The treatment consists in the use of all those remedies which act on the various secretions: so that, the demand being increased, the supply will have to be increased accordingly; and in this manner some of the collected fluid may be taken up by the absorbents. To this end bleeding if the dropsy be very active; purgatives, diuretics, sudorifics, sialagogues, &c., are the remedies chiefly depended upon.

An effusion of serum, often owing to inflammation of the spinal membranes — myeli'tis exsudati'va — and forming a soft, frequently transparent, tumour, constituted of the membranes of the spinal marrow, which are distended and projecting backwards from the vertebral canal, the posterior paries of which, when the affection is congenital, is wanting to a certain extent — Spi'na bif'ida, Atelorachid'ia, Hydrora'chis dehis'cens seu congen'ita, Schistorrha'chis, Spi'nola. The disease is often accompanied with paralysis of the lower extremities. It is congenital, and situate in the lumbar or sacral regions. It is almost always fatal:—the tumour rupturing, and death occurring instantaneously. On dissection, a simple separation or complete absence of the spinous processes of the vertebræ is perceived, with, at times, destruction or absence of spinal marrow. The treatment is the same as in hydrocephalus chronicus; and, as in it, advantage seems occasionally to have been derived by puncturing with a fine needle.

Idiopathic hydrothorax, termed by Laënnec, Hydropisie des plèvres, Drop'sy of the Pleu'ræ—by Piorry, Hydropleurie—is a rare disease, and not easy of diagnosis. It generally exists only on one side, which, if the fluid effused be considerable, projects more than the other. Dyspnœa, and fluctuation perceptible to the ear, are characteristic symptoms. When the chest is examined with the stethoscope, respiration is found to be wanting every where except at the root of the lung. The sound is also dull on percussion.

Effusion into the chest, as a result of inflammation of some thoracic viscus, is as common as the other is rare. It is usually a fatal symptom. It has been called symptomatic hydrothorax.

In hydrothorax, the course of treatment proper in dropsies in general must be adopted. Diure-tics seem here to be especially useful; probably on account of the great activity of pulmonary absorption. Paracentesis can rarely be serviceable.

HYDROTHORAX CHYLOSUS, Chylothorax — h. Purulentus, Empyema.

HYDROTICA, (ὑδωρ, 'water,') Hydragogues.

HYDRO'TIS, gen. Hydro'tidis, (hydro, and ους, gen. ωτος, 'the ear.') Dropsy of the ear. Properly, an accumulation of mucous or muco-purulent matter in the middle ear.

The semilunar, parabolic, or circular fold, situate at the outer orifice of the vagina in virgins, especially during youth and prior to menstruation. This membrane is ordinarily ruptured by the first venereal act, and is effaced by accouchement; some irregular flaps remaining, to which the name Carun'culæ Myrtifor'mes has been given by reason of their resemblance to the leaves of the myrtle. Many circumstances of an innocent character may occasion a rupture or destruction of this membrane. It is often, indeed, found absent in children soon after birth; whilst it may remain entire after copulation. Hence the presence of the hymen does not absolutely prove virginity; nor does its absence prove incontinence, although its presence would be primâ facie evidence of continence.

This disease is probably so called, from the circumstance of some hypochondriacs having felt an uneasy sensation in the hypochondriac regions. The disease seems really to be, as Pinel has classed it, a species of neurosis, and of mental alienation, which is observed in persons who in other respects are of sound judgment, but who reason erroneously on whatever concerns their own health. Hypochondriasis is characterized by disordered digestion, without fever or local lesion; flatulence; borborygmi; extreme increase of sensibility; palpitations; illusions of the senses; a succession of morbid feelings, which appear to simulate the greater part of diseases; panics; exaggerated uneasiness of various kinds; chiefly in what regards the health, &c. Indigestion has usually been considered the cause of hypochondriasis. They are, unquestionably, much connected with each other: but there is every reason to believe, that the seat of the affection is really, though functionally, in the brain. The disease almost always appears at the adult age, most commonly in irritable individuals; and in those exhausted, or rather in the habit of being exhausted, by mental labour, overwhelmed with domestic or public affairs, &c.

The treatment is almost entirely moral. The condition of the digestive function must, however, be accurately attended to.

It requires the use of local and general antiphlogistics, and sorbefacients. At times, it is necessary to puncture the cornea and evacuate the pus.

The animal is in the habit of evacuating the urine at one spot, where its aqueous parts evaporate in the sun—the more tenacious adhering to the rock and hardening.

In smell, and medical properties, it most resembles castor, which, according to Dr. Pappe, it may replace. It is used by the Cape farmers in nervous and spasmodic affections.

A species of neurosis, classed amongst the spasmi by Sauvages and Cullen, and in the Névroses de la génération, by Pinel. It received the name hysteria, because it was reputed to have its seat in the uterus. It generally occurs in paroxysms; the principal characters of which consist in alternate fits of laughing and crying, with a sensation as if a ball ascends from the hypogastrium towards the stomach, chest, and neck, producing a sense of strangulation. If the attack be violent, there is, sometimes, loss of consciousness (although the presence of consciousness generally distinguishes hysteria from epilepsy) and convulsions. The duration of the attacks is very variable. It appears to be dependent upon irregularity of nervous distribution in very impressible persons, and is not confined to the female; for well-marked cases of hysteria are occasionally met with in men. During the fit,—dashing cold water on the face, stimulants applied to the nose, or exhibited internally, and antispasmodics, form the therapeutical agents. Exercise, tranquillity of mind, amusing and agreeable occupations constitute the prophylactics. See Mania, dancing.

The filtered and evaporated product is then dissolved in alcohol; and the mixture filtered and evaporated in shallow vessels.

IL'IAC, Ili'acus, Il'ial, (F.) Iliaque, (from ilia.) Relating to, or connected with, the flanks.

Iliac Ar'teries, Arte'riæ Ili'acæ. This term has been given to several arteries. The Primary Iliacs, (F.) A. Iliaques primitives, — A. Pelvicrurales, (Ch.) arise from the bifurcation of the aorta, opposite the body of the 4th lumbar vertebra, and descend, in a divergent manner; until, opposite the sacro-iliac symphysis, they divide into two considerable trunks,—the inter'nal Iliac or hypogastric (which see), and the exter'nal Iliac—Portion Iliaque de la crurale, (Ch.) This proceeds from the sacro-iliac juncture as far as the crural arch, when it assumes the name Femoral Artery. Before passing under the arch it gives off two pretty considerable branches,—the Epigastric, and the Circumflex'a Il'ii. This last, which is called, also, anterior Iliac by some anatomists, — Circonflexe de l'Ilium (Ch.)—leaves the external iliac at the crural arch. It ascends along the outer edge of the iliacus muscle, and divides into two branches — an internal and an external.

The Iliaca Inter'na Mi'nor seu Il'iolumba'lis is a small artery, which sometimes arises from the hypogastric; at others, from the beginning of the gluteal. It is sent, chiefly, to the psoas and iliacus internus muscles.

Iliac Crest, Cris'ta Il'ii, is the upper margin of the ilium. (F.) Créte Iliaque. It is very thick, and curved like the Italic S. It affords attachment to the broad muscles of the abdomen.

Iliac Fos'sæ are two in number; the internal, the depression presented by the ilium on its interior, and at the upper part in which the Iliacus internus is lodged: — and the external, an excavation on the outer surface of the same bone, occupied by the Glutæi muscles.

Iliac Mus'cle, Inter'nal, Ili'acus inter'nus Muscle, Ili'acus, Iliaco-trochantérien (Ch.); Femur moven'tium sep'timus, Iliac muscle, is situate in the fossa iliaca, and at the anterior and superior part of the thigh. It is broad, radiated, triangular; and is attached, above, to the two upper thirds of the fossa iliaca, and to the internal part of the iliac crest: — below, it terminates by a tendon, which is common to it and the psoas magnus, and is fixed into the lesser trochanter. When this muscle contracts, it bends the pelvis on the thigh, and conversely. It is also a rotator of the thigh outwards, and prevents the trunk from falling backwards.

Iliac Passion, Ileus.

Iliac Re'gions, Regio'nes ili'acæ, Inan'ia, are the sides of the abdomen between the ribs and the hips.

Iliac Spines, Spi'nous Proc''esses of the Il'ium, are four in number. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. Of the anterior, one is superior. It bounds the crista ilii anteriorly, and affords origin to the sartorius muscle. The other is inferior, and receives the tendinous origin of the rectus femoris.

The two Posterior Iliac Spines are divided, like the anterior, into superior and inferior. They afford insertion to strong ligaments, which unite the ilium with the sacrum.

(It was probably so called from its seeming to support the intestine ilion; or, perhaps, because its crest is curved upon itself, from ειλεω, 'I twist,' 'I roll.') This portion of the os innominatum is usually so called in the adult. The posterior surface is called Dorsum, the internal Venter. The upper semicircular edge is the Crista or Spine, at the anterior part of which is the anterior and superior spinous process; and, below, the anterior and inferior spinous process. INFLAMMA'TION, Inflamma'tio, so called in consequence of the acute or burning pain felt in a part affected with it. Phleg'monē, Phlogo'sis, Ecphlogo'sis, Epiphleg'ia, Exap'sis, Phlegma'sia, Causo'ma, Empres'ma, Phlo'gia, Hyperendosmose (Dutrochet), Incen'dium, Hyperhæmato'sis, Hyperæ'mia acti'va, Phleboplero'sis ecphrac'tica; (F.) Inflammation, improperly Angiite. Altered nutrition in a part is occasioned by some agency; — owing to which the blood flows into the capillary vessels in greater abundance than natural, and those vessels become over-dilated and enfeebled; whence result pain, redness, heat, tension, and swelling; symptoms which appear in greater or less severity, according to the structure, vital properties, and functions of the part affected, and its connexion with other parts, as well as according to the constitution of the individual.

Simple accumulation of blood in the capillaries of the part is hyperæmia, not inflammation. The latter requires, in addition, altered nutrition of the vessels themselves, and the surrounding tissues.

The inflammations of the areolar and serous membranes greatly agree;—and those of the mucous and skin; the former being more active, and constituting the phlegmonous variety;—the latter, the erythematic or erysipelatous. Of this variety is the diffusive inflammation produced by morbid poisons,—as during dissection, where solutions of continuity exist in the fingers of the operator. It is seen, too, in workers in bone, and hence has been called bone fever. Preparatory to the turning of bones, it is customary to macerate them in water. The fluid soon becomes putrid, and if the hands be kept in it diffusive inflammation results.

Inflammation may end by resolution, suppuration, gangrene, adhesion, effusion, or induration. Each of the inflammations of internal organs has received a name according to the organ affected; —as, gastritis, cephalitis, enteritis, hepatitis, &c. Besides the above inflammations, it has been considered, that there is an instinctive kind established for the union of parts which have been divided, whether the union takes place immediately, or by the aid of an intermediate body. This is the adhesive inflammation of some; but it may well be questioned whether inflammation is ever desirable in such cases. See Adhesion, Callus, Cicatrix. Bronssais considered that the term inflammation should include every local exaltation of the organic movements which is sufficiently great to disturb the harmony of the functions, and disorganize the texture in which it is situate. He farther extended the name inflammation to irritations which do not induce disorganization of the textures, and which had been previously, and are still, called fevers.

Examination of the blood drawn always exhibits an increase of the fibrinous element — the average proportion of which, in healthy blood, is about three in the thousand. In inflammation, it at times rises as high as ten. In fevers unaccompanied with inflammation, the proportion is natural, or below the average; but whenever inflammation supervenes, it immediately rises.

External inflammation is easily detected by the characters already mentioned:—internal, by disturbance of function and pain upon pressure; but the last sign is often not available. Both forms require the removal of all irritation, and the reduction of vascular excitement and nervous irritability; hence, blood-letting—local and general — sedatives, refrigerants, and counter-irritants become valuable remedies in almost all cases of inflammation.

Inflammation is not always of the active kind. There is a form, Inflamma'tio deb'ilis, which occurs in low conditions of the system, and in broken down constitutions, which, like many forms of chronic inflammation, requires a stimulant, rather than a sedative, mode of treatment.

INGUINAL AR'TERY is that portion of the femoral artery situate immediately beneath the crural arch in the inguinal region.

INGUINAL CANAL' is a canal, about two inches in length, proceeding obliquely downwards, inwards and forwards at the lower part of the abdomen; through which passes the spermatic cord, in men, and the round ligament of the uterus in women. This canal is formed, inferiorly and anteriorly, by the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle; posteriorly by the fascia transversalis, which is joined to the preceding aponeurosis, and forms with it a deep channel, into which are received the lesser oblique and transversalis muscles. The inguinal canal has two apertures; the one, the lower and inner, is called the inguinal or abdominal ring. It is bounded by two strong tendinous pillars which fix it—the innermost to the symphysis, the outermost to the spine of the pubis. The upper and outer aperture is formed by the fascia transversalis. From the edge of this aperture arises a membranous funnel,—a prolongation of the fascia transversalis,—which receives the spermatic vessels; forms their proper sheath, and accompanies them as far as the testicle. On its inside lies the epigastric artery. Above it, is the lower edge of the transversalis muscle: and, below, it is bounded by the channel of the greater oblique. By following the oblique direction of this canal, and passing, consequently, on the outside of the epigastric artery, the viscera are displaced, so as to constitute internal inguinal hernia.

INGUINAL GLANDS, Glan'dulæ inguina'les, (F.) Glandes inguinales, are the lymphatic glands or ganglions of the groin. There are two sets, one superficial; the other deep-seated; the former are larger, and their number varies, but on the average there are eight or ten which are placed irregularly about Poupart's ligament. The latter, or deep-seated, are situate behind the others around the femoral artery and vein.

The liquid injected is also called an injection. Anatomists use injections—Injectio'nes anotom'icæ—for filling the cavities of vessels, in order that they may be rendered more apparent, and their dissection be facilitated. For this purpose, they employ syringes of different dimensions, and various materials. The most common injections are made of soot, wax, and turpentine, coloured with lampblack, vermilion, &c. Its fibres, which are always longer above than below, are separated by small apertures, which are traversed by vessels. It prevents the separation of the two clavicles in the forced depression of the shoulder.

INTERCOS'TAL, Intercosta'lis, (inter, and costa, 'a rib.') Mesopleu'rus, Mesopleu'rius. That which is situate between the ribs.

INTERCOSTAL AR'TERIES vary in number. There is constantly, however, a supe'rior, Arte'ria Intercosta'lis supe'rior seu Intercosta'lis subcla'via, which is given off from the posterior part of the subclavian, and which sends branches into the first two or three intercostal spaces; and, generally, eight or nine inferior or aortic intercostals. These arise from the lateral and posterior parts of the pectoral aorta, and ascend obliquely in front of the vertebral column, to gain the intercostal spaces, where they divide into a dorsal branch and an intercostal, properly so called.

INTERCOSTAL MUS'CLES are distinguished into internal,—inter-plévrocostaux of Dumas,—and external. The former are inserted into the inner lip, the latter into the outer lip of the edge of the ribs. The fibres of the external intercostals are directed obliquely downwards and forwards; and those of the internal downwards and backwards. Both are inspiratory or expiratory muscles, according as they take their origin on the upper or lower rib. Some small, fleshy fibres, seen occasionally at the inner surface of the thorax, descending obliquely from one rib to another, have been called Infracostales, (F.) Sousocostaux.

INTERCOSTAL VEINS are distinguished like the arteries. The right superior intercostal vein is often wanting. When it exists, it opens into the back part of the subclavian. The same vein of the left side is very large. It communicates with the demi-azygos, receives the left bronchial vein, and opens into the corresponding subclavian. The right inferior intercostal veins open into the vena azygos; and those of the left into the demiazygos.

There is said to be intermission of the pulse, when, in a given number of pulsations, one or more may be wanting.

Périodique*, is a fever consisting of paroxysms, with a complete state of apyrexia in the intervals. The chief types are Quotid'ian, Ter'tian, and Quart'an. The symptoms of intermittents are those of a decided and completely marked cold stage, or Stage of Concentra'tion, (F.) Stade de froid, attended with paleness; collapse; impaired sensibility; and coldness, more or less diffused, followed by general rigors. After this occurs the hot stage, or stage of expansion, (F.) Stade de la chaleur, the heat returning partially and irregularly, and at length becoming universal, and much above the standard of health. The pulse is now hard and strong; tongue white; urine, high-coloured; thirst, considerable. At length, the sweat'ing stage, or stage of termination, (F.) Stade de sueur, makes its appearance; the moisture usually beginning on the forehead, face, and neck, and soon extending universally; the heat abating; thirst ceasing; the urine throwing down a sediment, and the functions being gradually restored to their wonted state. The tertian type is the most common, and the quartan the most severe. The quotidian more readily changes into a remittent and continued fever. The quartan has, generally, the longest cold stage, the tertian the longest hot. The chief exciting cause is marsh miasmata, the malaria of the Italians. Ague, also, occurs in districts where there are no marshy emanations. Such districts are, generally, of a volcanic nature:—further we know not. When the disease has once attacked an individual, it is apt to recur. The prognosis is, in general, favourable, as far as regards life; but long protracted intermittents are apt to induce visceral obstructions, and engorgements, which may end in dropsy. In some countries, the disease is of a very pernicious character. The indications of treatment are, 1. To abate the violence of the paroxysm; and, 2. To prevent its return. The first indication demands the adoption of the general principles and remedies required in ordinary fever. The second is the most important. The period of apyrexia is that for action. The means for fulfilling this indication are:—the use of emetics, purgatives, antiperiodics, as cinchona, quinia, &c., arsenic, and forcible impressions made on the mind of the patient.

INTERMUS'CULAR, Intermuscula'ris, (F.) Intermusculaire, (inter, and musculus, 'a muscle.') That which is placed between muscles.

This epithet is given to parts that look towards an imaginary central plane, which divides the body into two equal and symmetrical portions, as well as to those which correspond with a cavity. Thus, we say — the internal or inner surface of the arm or thigh, skull, &c.

INTEROS'SEOUS AR'TERIES OF THE FOREARM AND HAND. Of these there are several. The common interosseous artery arises from the posterior part of the ulnar, a little below the bicipital tuberosity of the radius; passes backwards and divides into two branches: the one called anterior interosseous descends vertically, anterior to the interosseous ligament; the other, called posterior interosseous, passes above the ligament, appears at its posterior part and divides into two great branches, — the posterior recurrent radial and the posterior interosseous, properly so called. In the hand,—1. The dorsal metacarpal interosseous arteries are given off by the dorsalis carpi, a division of the radial artery. 2. The palmar interosseous arteries, which arise from the convexity of the deep palmar arch, and give off the middle interosseous arteries. 3. The dorsal interosseous of the index, proceeding directly from the radial artery. In the foot, are distinguished:— 1. The dorsal interosseous arteries, three in number, which arise from the artery of the metatarsus, a branch of the dorsalis tarsi. 2. The plantar interosseous arteries, which are, also, three in number, and arise from the plantar arch.

INTEROSSEOUS LIG'AMENTS. Ligaments seated between certain bones, which they unite; such are the ligaments between the radius and ulna, and between the tibia and fibula.

INTEROSSEOUS MUS'CLES. These occupy the spaces between the bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus; and, consequently, belong,—some to the hand, others to the foot.

INTEROSSEOUS NERVE is a branch, given off by the median nerve, which descends before the interosseous ligament, accompanying the artery of the same name.

INTEROSSEOUS VEINS have the same arrangement as the arteries.

INTEROSSEUS MANÛS, (F.) Muscle interosseux de la main,— Métacarpo-phalangien-latéral suspalmaire et métacarpo-phalangien latéral, (Ch.) These muscles are seven in number; two for each of the three middle fingers, and one for the little finger. Four are situate on the back of the hand, and three only in the palm. They are inserted into the metacarpal bones, and send a tendon to the tendon of the extensor communis. According to their office, they are, to each finger, an adductor and an abductor. The index has a dorsal abductor and a palmar one. The middle finger has two dorsal muscles for adductor and abductor; the ring finger has a dorsal adductor and a palmar abductor; and the little finger has only one interosseous abductor, which is palmar. These muscles produce abduction and adduction of the fingers, which they can also extend, owing to their connexion with the extensor tendons.

INTEROS'SEUS PE'DIS, Métatarso-phalangien-latéral, (Ch.) The number, arrangement, shape, and uses of these are the same as in the case of the preceding muscles. Four are dorsal, and three plantar: six belong to the three middle toes and one to the little toe. The great toe is devoid of them. As in the hand, they are distinguished, in each toe, into abductor and adductor.

In the neck, they are replaced by the muscles of the same name. They prevent the too great flexion of the spine, and keep the spinous processes in situ. The outermost thickened portions of these are, sometimes, termed Ligamen'ta a'picum.

INTERSPINA'LES COL'LI, Spina'les Colli mino'res, Spina'ti, (F.) Interépineux-cervicaux, Intercervicaux, (Ch.) These are twelve in number, and occupy, in two parallel rows, the intervals between the spinous processes of the cervical vertebræ, from that of the atlas and vertebra dentata, to that between the last cervical and first dorsal vertebra. They are flat, thin, and quadrilateral. These muscles contribute to the extension of the neck and to throwing the head backwards.

of the spinous processes, from the third dorsal vertebra to the second lumbar. The other (Musele petit épineux du dos, Winslow) covered by the preceding. They are situate on each side of the interspinal ligament, in the form of small, short, flat bundles, which pass from one spinous process to the second, third or fourth above it. These muscles aid in extending the vertebral column; and incline it a little to one side, when they act on one side only.

INTER'STICE, Interstit''ium, Aræo'ma, (inter, and sistere, 'to place.') Diaste'ma, Interval'lum. Anatomists have given this name to the intervals between organs. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. The former are six in number; the latter five. These muscles bring the transverse processes of the neck nearer each other, and contribute to the lateral flexion of the neck.

INTERTRANSVERSALES LUMBO'RUM, Mus'culi intertransver'si lumbo'rum, (F.) Intertransversaires des lombes. These are almost entirely fleshy, and ten in number; five on each side. They are similar to the preceding in general arrangement; except that they are more marked, and not placed in two rows. Each intertransverse space contains only one. They are quadrilateral, and flat. The first occupies the space between the transverse processes of the first lumbar and the last dorsal vertebræ; and the last is between that of the fourth and fifth lumbar vertebræ. These muscles incline the lumbar region laterally; and straighten it when inclined to one side.

In man, its length is six or eight times that of the body. It it divided into two principal portions, called small intestine and large intestine. The former, Intesti'num ten'uë, I. grac''ilë, Aræ'a, (F.) Intestin grêle, constituting nearly four-fifths of the whole length, begins at the stomach and terminates in the right iliac region. It is divided into duodenum, jejunum and ileum. Some anatomists give the name small intestine to the last two only; which are kept in place by the mesentery, and form a large paquet, occupying the umbilical and hypogastric regions, a part of the flanks, of the iliac regions, and of the cavity of the pelvis. It is composed of, 1. A serous membrane, which is peritoneal. 2. Of a muscular coat, whose fibres are very pale, and are placed, in part, longitudinally; but the greater part transversely. 3. Of a whitish, mucous membrane; villous, and forming folds or valves—valvulæ conniventes—at its inner surface, and furnished with a number of mucous follicles, called glands of Lieberkühn, (Crypts or Follicles of Lieberkühn,) and in the duodenum with the glands of Brunner. The arteries of the small intestine proceed from the superior mesenteric; its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves proceed from the superior mesenteric plexus. The large intestine, Intesti'num cras'sum, Megalocœ'lia, (F.) Gros intestin, forms a sequence to the small. It is much shorter, and is solidly attached in the regions of the abdomen which it occupies. It begins in the right iliac region; ascends along the right flank, till beneath the liver, when it crosses the upper part of the abdomen, descends into the left iliac fossa, and plunges into the pelvic cavity, to gain the anus. The great intestine is usually divided into three portions,—the cæcum, colon and rectum. It receives its arteries from the superior and inferior mesenterics. Its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves are furnished by the mesenteric plexuses. Its lymphatic vessels, which are much less numerous than those of the small intestine, pass into the ganglions or glands seated between the different reflections of the peritoneum, which fix it to the abdominal parietes. The use of the intestines is, — in the upper part, to effect the chylification of the food and the absorption of the chyle; — in the lower, to serve as a reservoir, where the excrementitious portion of the food collects; and, also, as an excretory duct, which effects its expulsion.

B., 1864), Io'dium, Io'nium, Io'num, (F.) Iode, (ιωδης, viola'ceus, 'of a violet colour;' so called from the violet vapour it exhales when volatilized.) It is contained in the mother waters of certain fuci, and is obtained by pouring an excess of concentrated sulphuric acid on the water obtained by burning different fuci, lixiviating the ashes and concentrating the liquor. The mixture is placed in a retort to which a receiver is attached, and is boiled. The iodine passes over and is condensed. It is solid, in the form of plates; of a bluish gray colour, of a metallic brightness, and smell similar to that of the chloride of sulphur. Its s. g. is 4.946. When heated, it becomes volatilized, and affords the vapour which characterizes it. With oxygen it forms Iod'ic acid, and with hydrogen Hydriod'ic acid. The tincture of iodine and the iodides have been employed with great success in the treatment of goitre and of some scrofulous affections. It must be administered in a very small dose and for a long period. It is said to be apt, however, to induce cholera morbus, signs of great nervous irritability, Iodom'ethē, (F.) Ivresse iodique, and emaciation of the mammæ. When these symptoms, collectively termed I'odism, Iodo'sis, and Iodin'ia, (F.) Cachexie iodée, are urgent, the dose may be diminished, or it may be wholly discontinued, and afterwards resumed. IRIS, gen. I'ridis, (ἰρις, gen. ιριδος,) Gram'mē. So called from its resembling the rainbow in a variety of colours. A membrane, stretched vertically at the anterior part of the eye, in the midst of the aqueous humour, in which it forms a kind of circular, flat partition, separating the anterior from the posterior chamber. It is perforated by a circular opening called the pupil, which is constantly varying its dimensions, owing to the varying contractions of the fibres of the iris. Its posterior surface has been called uvea, from the thick, black varnish which covers it. The pigmentary stratum, on its free surface, appears to be bounded by a delicate, but sharply defined, line, which, has been described as a special membrane — Membra'na pigmen'ti seu lim'itans seu lim'itans Paci'ni seu Jaco'bi Arnold. The greater circumference of the iris is adherent to the ciliary processes and circle. It has an external plane of radiated fibres and an internal one of circular fibres, which serve — the one to dilate, the other to contract the aperture of the pupil. The iris receives the irian nerves. Its arteries are furnished by the long ciliary arteries, which form two circles by their anastomoses; the one very broad, near the great circumference; the other, smaller, and seated around the circumference of the pupil. The veins of the iris empty themselves into the Vasa vorticosa, and into the long ciliary veins. The use of the iris seems to be, — to regulate by its dilatation or contraction, the quantity of luminous rays necessary for distinct vision. The different colours of the iris occasion the variety in the colours of the human eye.

Iris, see Herpes Iris—i. Common, I. Germanica —i. Commun, I. Germanica—i. de Florence, I. Florentina.

Iris Florenti'na, Flor'entine i'ris or or'ris, (F.) Iris de Florence. Order, Iridaceæ. The rhizoma of this plant is extremely acrid in its recent state; and, when chewed, excites a pungent heat in the mouth, that continues for several hours. When dried, the acrimony is lost, or nearly so, and the smell is very agreeable. It is indebted to its agreeable flavour for its retention in the pharmacopœias, although it is ranked as an expectorant. The orris root of the shops is said to consist of the rhizomes of three species — I. Florenti'na, I. pal'lida, and I. German'ica.

Iris Fœtidis'sima. I. fœ'tida, Spath'ulæ fœ'tida, Xy'ris, Stinking i'ris, (F.) Iris puant, Glayeul puant. The root has been esteemed antispasmodic and narcotic.

The fresh roots have a disagreeable smell, and an acrid, nauseous taste. They are powerfully cathartic, and are given in dropsies, where such remedies are indicated.

The root has an acrid, styptic taste. It is an errhine, sialagogue, and acrid astringent. The expressed juice is diuretic, and said to be a useful application to serpiginous and other cutaneous affections. Rubbed on the gums, or chewed, it is said to cure toothache.

IRIS PUANT, I. fœtidissima — i. Stinking, I. fœtidissima.

Iris Versic'olor, I. hexago'na, Blue flag. The rhizoma of this is an active cathartic, and has been much used, as such, by the American Indians. It is reputed to be diuretic.

Iris Virgin'ica, Slen'der Blue flag; and Iris verna, are said to have virtues like those of I. versicolor.

Iris Vulgaris, I. Germanica.

IRISITIS, Iritis.

IRI'TIS, Inflamma'tion of the i'ris, Inflamma'tio i'ridis, Irisi'tis, Iridi'tis, (iris, and itis,) Urei'tis of some. The chief symptoms are; — change in the colour of the iris; fibres less movable; tooth-like processes shooting into the pupil; pupil irregularly contracted, with the ordinary signs of inflammation of the eye. If the inflammation does not yield, suppuration takes place; and although the matter may be absorbed, the iris remains immovable. It is often caused by syphilis. The general principles of treatment are, to deplete largely and exhibit mercury freely; along with attention to other means advisable in ophthalmia. The free use of quinia is sometimes serviceable. When the inflammation is seated in the serous covering of the iris, it is termed Iritis sero'sa.

KIDNEY, (etymology uncertain.) Serenius derives it fancifully from Su. Goth. qued, the belly; and nigh, (quasi, quidney.) Ren, Neph'ros, (Sc.) Neir, Nere, (F.) Rein. The kidneys or reins are the secretory organs of the urine. They are two glands, situate deeply,—the one on the right, and the other on the left side—in the hypochondres: at the sides of the lumbar vertebræ; behind the peritoneum; and in the midst of an abundant, fatty areolar tissue, Tu'nica seu Cap'sula adipo'sa. The kidney is of a reddishbrown colour; oval form; and flattened on two surfaces. It has, at its internal margin, a deep fissure, by which the renal vessels and nerves enter or quit the organ, and the ureter issues. It resembles, pretty accurately, the haricot or kidney-bean. Two substances are readily distinguishable in it;—the outer, secern'ing, cort'ical, gland'ular or vas'cular, Substan'tia cortica'lis seu glandulo'sa, which secretes the urine; and the inner, tu'bular, med'ullary, urinif'erous, conoid'al or ra'diated, Substan'tia Medulla'ris seu Tubulo'sa seu Fibro'sa, which appears under the form of small cones or unequal papillæ or mammillæ, each resulting from the union of small capillary tubes, adherent by one of their extremities to the cortical substance; and opening, by the other, at the summit of the cone, into calices, a species of membranous tubes, more or less numerous, which transmit the urine of the papillæ to the pelvis. By the pelvis is meant a small, membranous sac, of an irregularly oval shape, at the base of which are the orifices of the calices, and the other extremity of which is continuous with the ureter. The kidney is surrounded by a fibrous membrane proper to it, Perineph'rus, Tu'nica pro'pria seu albugin'ea. It has been shown by Mr. Bowman and others that the renal artery is distributed to the corpora Malpighiana, forming a pellet of convolutions, which is received into a flask-like dilatation of the ureter — Bowman's Cap'sule, and through which — it is conceived—the watery portion of the urine is separated. The blood then becomes venous, and is distributed by different veins—portal veins of the kidney—to the convoluted tubes through which the proper urine is secreted. Hence the blood passes into the renal vein. The intermediate vessels between the Malpighian bodies and the convoluted tubes have been termed the Por'tal Sys'tem of the Kid'ney.

A graduated compress is placed over the opening in the artery, and the bandage is applied over it; the balls of the roller being carried horizontally round to the opposite temple, where they are crossed obliquely and carried back to the part where the compress is situate. The hands are then changed with the rollers, crossing them so as to form a knot, and taking one above the head; the other beneath the chin. They are then crossed again, so as to form several knots, one above the other. This bandage is called, by some surgeons, so'lar or oblique cheveatre or capis'trum.

KYLLO'SIS. (κυλλος, 'crooked,' 'lame.') Cyllo'sis, Kyllopod'ia. Professor Chaussier so calls congenital distortion of the feet, Club'foot, Polt'foot, Stump'foot, (Prov.) Pommelfoot, Pummelfoot, Tal'ipes, (F.) Pied bot. Of this there are many varieties. In one, the foot, instead of resting on the soil, by the whole plantar surface, touches it only with the metatarsophalangian articulations. It seems as if turned backwards and broken upon the leg, (Pes seu Tal'ipes Equi'nus, Hip'popus, Oxypod'ia, Tipfoot, Horse'foot.) In other cases the foot is twisted inwards, (Va'rus, Tal'ipes varus, Blæsop'odes, Blæ'sopus, Cyllo'epus, Cyllop'oda, Cyllopod'ion, Lo'ripes, Cross'foot, (F.) Cagneux,) so that it rests only on the ground on its outer edge; or it may be twisted outwards, (Val'gus, Tal'ipes Valgus, Out'bow foot,) or rest only on its inner edge, or on the back part of the heel, Talipes calca'neus, Heel club'foot. In the flat'foot or splay'foot, Duck'foot, Splat'foot, Sar'apus, Plat'ypus, Platypod'ia, (F.) Pied plat, the plantar surface of the foot is flattened instead of being concave.

These deformities are rarely accidental. They are almost always congenital, and may be rectified, at an early period, by proper mechanical means to strengthen the foot gradually, and restore it to its proper shape and direction; and if these means fail, the tendons and muscles concerned in the deformity may be divided. A similar affection of the hand is called, by the French, Main bot.

KYMOGRAPH'ION, Cymograph'ion; (κυμα, 'wave,' and γραφω, 'I describe.') A wave describer or measurer. An instrument invented by Ludwig, which is self-registering, and exhibits the relation between the waves of the pulse and the undulations produced by respiration.

KYST, Cyst, Kys'tis, Cys'tis, Kys'tē, Cys'tē, (κυστις, κυστη, 'a bladder,' 'pouch.') (F.) Kyste. This term is generally applied to a pouch or sac, —Cysto'ma—without opening, and commonly of a membranous nature, which is accidentally developed in one of the natural cavities, or in the substance of organs. Many theories have been successively emitted to explain the formation of cysts, but none are entirely satisfactory. Some are formed by a thin, translucent membrane, having scarcely the thickness of the arachnoid; others of a whitish, fibro-cellular membrane, more or less thick. Some contain cartilaginous or bony flakes. The greater part have but one cavity; others, on the contrary, have several, separated by incomplete or imperfect septa, as is frequently seen in those developed in the ovaries. The matter contained in cysts is sometimes limpid, serous, yellowish white, reddish, and, at others, more or less thick, albuminous, adipous, or caseous. The tumour, formed by them, is called Encysted.

La'bial Ar'tery. Haller and Sabatier call thus the facial artery of the majority of anatomists. The labial arteries, properly so called, cor'onary ar'teries of the lips, (F.) Coronaires des lèvres, are two in number. The superior arises from the facial, above, and very close to, the commissure of the lips. It is large and tortuous, and is distributed to the upper lip. The lower arises from the facial, at a considerable distance from the commissure, and proceeds, in a serpentine course, into the substance of the lower lip, to which it is distributed.

Labial Glands. This name is given to a multitude of muciparous follicles, of some size, round, prominent, and separate from each other, which are found on the inner surface of the lips, below the mucous membrane.

Labial Veins are distinguished, like the arteries, into superior and inferior. They open into the facial vein;—a division of the internal jugular.

Each sac contains calcareous matter, constituting the Otoliths and Otoconia. When the sac is laid open, upon the upper and outer part, a partition appears, partaking of the nature of the sac, and called by Meckel, Septum vestib'uli nervo'so-membrana'ceum.

It is lined by a prolongation of the mucous membrane of the lachrymal sac; and its inferior orifice is furnished with a valvular duplicature. This duct transmits the tears, which have been absorbed at the great angle of the eye, by the puncta lacrymalia, into the nasal fossæ.

LACHRYMAL GLAND, Glan'dula lacryma'lis seu innomina'ta Gale'ni, is seated in a depression of the frontal bone at the upper, anterior, and outer part of the orbit. It is of about the size of an almond; and of an oval shape, flattened above and below:—its great diameter being the antero-posterior. It is composed of several small lobules, united by areolar tissue, and separated by it as well as by vessels and nerves which creep in the intervals. This gland has seven or eight excretory ducts, which open behind the upper eyelid. Its use is to secrete the tears, and pour them on the globe of the eye by the excretory ducts.

LACHRYMAL GROOVE, (F.) Gouttière lacrymale, is the bony channel, which lodges the lachrymal sac. It is seated at the anterior and inner part of the orbit, and is formed by the os unguis and the ascending process of the upper jaw bone.

They seem formed by a very delicate prolongation of the conjunctiva, which is continuous with the mucous membrane of the lachrymal sac, (F.) Reservoir des larmes:—the Sac'cus seu Si'nus seu La'cus lacryma'lis, Dacryocys'tis, Infundib'ulum lacryma'lē.

The remainder, or that part next the opposite side of the scalæ, is composed of a cartilaginous membrane, called by Valsalva, Zo'na seu Zo'nula Coch'leæ. By some anatomists the lamina is divided into a Zona os'sea and Z. mol'lis. By others it is considered to consist of four laminæ, when examined with a strong glass: a Zona os'sea next to the modiolus—a Zona coria'cea on the outer side of this: a Zona vesicula'ris—and a Zona membrana'cea, which is, perhaps, the lining membrane of the cochlea. At the apex of the cochlea, the lamina spiralis terminates by a pointed hookshaped process, ham'ulus lam'inæ spira'lis.

A surgical instrument used in the operation of phlebotomy. It is composed of two parts—the handle, (F.) Chasse, and the blade, (F.) Lame. The former is made of two small plates of ivory, bone, or shell, movable on the blade, for whose preservation they are intended. The blade is formed of well-polished steel. Lancets are made of different shapes; some being broad-shouldered—others, spear-pointed. The French distinguished three kinds: 1. Lancette à grain d'orge, which, on account of the almost oval shape of its point, makes a large opening. 2. The L. à langue de serpent, which is very narrow towards the point; and 3. L. à grain d'avoine, which holds a medium station between the two former, and is generally preferred.

LAND'S END, CLI'MATE OF. The climate of the Land's End, in England, resembles that of the south of Devonshire, but is more relaxing. It is considered to be most likely to prove beneficial in consumptive cases in which the disease is accompanied by an irritated state of the pulmonary mucous membrane, producing a dry cough. Where the system is relaxed, and the secretion from the lungs considerable, the climate, it is conceived, will generally prove injurious. As a brumal retreat, the southern coast of Devonshire would seem to be preferable to it.

LARYNGE'AL or Laryn'geal, Larynge'us, (F.) Laryngé, Laryngien, (from larynx.) That which belongs to the larynx.

LARYNGEAL AR'TERIES are given off from the thyroid arteries.

LARYNGEAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs Laryngés, are two in number;—a superior and an inferior. The superior laryngeal nerve is given off from the trunk of the pneumogastric, at the upper and deep part of the neck. It passes downwards and inwards, behind the internal carotid artery, and divides into two secondary branches; the one, external, which distributes its filaments, on the outside of the larynx, to the sterno-thyroid, hyo-thyroid, constrictor inferior, crico-thyroid muscles, &c. The other, the internal, which crosses the thyro-hyoid membrane, and gives filaments to the epiglottis, the mucous membranes of the pharynx and larynx, to the arytenoid gland, the arytenoid and crico-thyroid muscles, and ultimately intermingles with the inferior laryngeal nerve. The inferior laryngeal nerves or recur'rents, Nervi reversi'vi, Rameaux Trachéaux (Ch.), arise from the trunk of the pneumogastric within the thorax. They ascend in the furrow, which separates the trachea from the œsophagus, to be distributed on the neck, after having been reflected;—the left around the arch of the aorta; the right, around the corresponding subclavian. They send off filaments to the cardiac plexuses; to the parietes of the œsophagus, and trachea; to the thyroid gland; to the inferior constrictor of the pharynx; the posterior and lateral crico-arytenoid and thyro-arytenoid muscles; and to the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx.

LARYNGEAL PHTHISIS, Phthisis, laryngeal.

LARYNGEAL POUCHES. Small culs-de-sac, which lead from the anterior part of each ventricle of the larynx upwards, for the space of half an inch, between the superior ligaments on the inner side, and the thyroid cartilage on the outer, reaching as high as the upper border of that cartilage at the sides of the epiglottis. Numerous small glands open into them.

This disease, in some measure, resembles croup; but is usually devoid of that peculiar sonorous inspiration, which attends the latter. There is, also, pain upon pressing the larynx; and, whilst laryngitis is a disease of more advanced life, croup attacks children. The membraniform exudation is, also, absent; probably, because the inflammation, being seated above the glottis, the coagulable lymph is readily expectorated. It requires the most active treatment.

Simple Laryngitis is called by some mu'cous Laryngitis, Laryngitis acu'ta seu muco'sa acu'ta, (F.) Laryngite muqueuse, to distinguish it from submucous Laryngitis or Œdema of the glottis.

Chron'ic Laryngitis is generally regarded as synonymous with laryngeal phthisis; but it may exist independently.

Bentley, Laurence, Geoffroi, &c., regard it to have been the same as asafœtida: — Theophrastus, Dioscorides, and the ancient scholiast of Aristophanes, however, by assigning a sweet and agreeable flavour to the laserpitium, discountenance the idea. From whatever plant obtained, it was so rare, and consequently so costly, that the Romans deposited it in the public treasury. LATIS'SIMUS DORSI, Aniscalp'tor, Bra'chium movens quartus, (F.) Lombo-huméral (Ch.), Dorsi-lombo-sacro-huméral, Muscle grand dorsal, M. très large du dos. A flat muscle; broad, especially below; thin; quadrilateral; and situate at the posterior, lateral, and inferior region of the trunk. It is attached to the posterior half of the outer lip of the crest of the ilium; to the posterior surface of the sacrum; to the spinous processes of the six or seven last dorsal vertebræ, to all those of the loins, and to the last four false ribs, and is inserted by a strong tendon at the posterior edge of the bicipital groove of the humerus. Its upper fibres are almost horizontal; the middle very long and oblique upwards and outwards; and the anterior almost vertical. This muscle carries the arm backwards, depressing it, and making it turn on its axis. It also draws backwards and downwards the prominence of the shoulder. When, suspended by an arm, we make an effort to raise ourselves, it draws the trunk towards the arm. It can, also, raise the ribs by assuming its fixed point on the humerus, and become an inspiratory muscle.

This term has been applied to various affections, very different in character. 1. To the Lep'rosy of the Jews, Leu'cē, Lepido'sis Lepri'asis canes'cens, Le'pra Mosa'ica seu Hebræo'rum,—a variety of the Al'phos or Le'pra alphoï'des. The leuce was, generally, not scaly, but consisted of smooth, shining patches, on which the hair turned white and silky, and the skin, with the muscular flesh, lost its sensibility. It was incurable. 2. To the Elephantiasis or Le'pra of the A'rabs, see Elephantiasis; and 3. To the Le'pra of the Greeks, which includes all the varieties met with at the present day. It is characterized by scaly patches of different sizes, but having always nearly a circular form. Bateman and Willan describe three chief varieties of this lepra.

1. Lepra alphoï'des, Lepido'sis Lepri'asis al'bida, Al'phos, Morphæ'a al'ba, Vitili'go al'phus, Al'baras al'ba, Al'barœs, Al'baros, Lèpre écailleuse of Alibert, White lep'rosy. An affection, characterized by white patches, surrounded by a rose-coloured areola, which appears here and there on the surface; depressed in the middle.

2. Lepra ni'gricans seu me'las seu maculo'sa ni'gra, Vitili'go Me'las seu ni'gra, Morphæ'a seu Al'baras ni'gra, Me'las, Lepido'sis lepri'asis ni'gricans, Black lep'rosy; in which the scales are livid; the size of half a dollar; and diffused over the body, but less widely than in the Alphoïdes. The French pathologists usually admit three species of lepra, to which they give the epithets scaly, (squameuse,) crustaceous, (crustacée,) and tubercular, (tuberculeuse,) according as the skin may be covered with scales, crusts, or tubercles.

3. Lepra vulga'ris, Lepido'sis lepri'asis vulga'ris, Dartre furfuracée arrondie, of Alibert, characterized as follows: scales glabrous, whitish, size of a crown piece; preceded by smaller reddish and glossy elevations of the skin, encircled by a dry, red, and slightly elevated border; often confluent; sometimes covering the whole of the body except the face.

Lepra appears to be endemic in Egypt, in Java, and certain parts of Norway and Sweden. Imperfect and faulty nutriment seems to contribute to its development. The means, best adapted for its removal, are:—a mild, unirritating diet, emollient fomentations—sulphureous baths, fumigations, &c.; but, often, all remedial agents will be found ineffectual.

Both are essentially different from nebula of the cornea; nebula being usually the result of chronic ophthalmy and an effusion of a milky serum into the texture of the delicate continuation of the conjunctiva over the cornea:—the others are the result of violent, acute ophthalmia. In this state, a thick, coagulable lymph is extravasated from the arteries, sometimes superficially, at other times deeply into the substance of the cornea. On other occasions, the disease consists of a firm, callous cicatrix on this membrane,—the effect of a wound or ulcer with loss of substance. The affection is more difficult of cure in proportion to its duration and to the age of the individual; the activity of the absorbents being greater in youth. If inflammation still exist, antiphlogistics must be persevered in, and, afterwards, gentle stimulants be used to excite absorption; along with the internal use of mercury or iodine.

Attention to the general health, change of air, keeping up a perspirable state of the surface by flannel worn next the skin, the horizontal posture, &c., do more than pharmaceutical agents; which are almost entirely confined to astringent injections. These may be employed, when the discharge is so great as to require them.

It is attached, above, to the posterior surface of the body of the pubis, to the upper part of the obturator foramen, and to the spine of the ischium, and is inserted into the coccyx, into an aponeurotic line common to it and its fellow, and into the lateral parts of the rectum. This muscle supports the rectum; raises it, and carries it upwards during the evacuation of the excrement. It can, also, compress the bladder and vesiculæ seminales, and thus favour the expulsion of the urine and sperm.

Levator La'bii Superio'ris A'læque Na'si, Incisi'vus latera'lis et pyramida'lis, (F.) Grand sus-maxillo-labial (Ch.), Élévateur commun de l'aile du nez et de la lèvre supérieure. This muscle is a fleshy, thin, triangular bundle, situate at the sides of the nose. It arises from the ascending process of the superior maxillary bone; thence its fibres descend in a diverging manner, a part being inserted into the ala of the nose, and a part losing themselves in the upper lip. This muscle raises the upper lip and ala nasi, which it draws a little outwards.

Levator La'bii Superio'ris Pro'prius, Mus'culus incisi'vus, Eleva'tor la'bii superio'ris pro'prius, (F.) Moyen sus-maxillo-labial, (Ch.), Orbito-maxillo-labial. This thin, flat, quadrilateral muscle is situate at the middle and inner part of the face. By its posterior extremity it is inserted into the little ala of the sphenoid bone, immediately in front of the foramen opticum, and by its anterior extremity, which is expanded, it terminates at the upper margin of the tarsal cartilage of the eyelid. It is situate at the posterior and lateral part of the neck, and at the upper part of the back. It is long, flat, and broader above than below. In this latter direction, it is inserted into the superior internal angle of the scapula; and in the former, into the tops of the transverse processes of the first four cervical vertebræ. It depresses the prominence of the shoulder by raising the posterior angle of the scapula, on which it impresses a kind of rotary motion. It can, also, draw the head to one side.

LE'VER, (from levare, 'to lift up.') Vec'tis, Moch'lus, Porrec'tum. An inflexible rod, turning round a fixed point, and used for moving bodies, bearing burdens, or raising them. The point on which the lever moves is called the Fulcrum Hypomoch'lion. The force which moves the lever is called the power; and the weight to be moved the resistance. There are three kinds of levers. A lever of the first kind has the fulcrum between the power and resistance. A lever of the second kind has the resistance between the fulcrum and power; whilst a lever of the third kind has the power between the fulcrum and resistance. In the locomotive system of the human body, we have examples of all the three kinds. The bones represent levers; the muscles of locomotion are powers; the weight of parts to be moved constitutes the resistance. The fulcra are, at times, the joints; at others, the ground, &c. The head moves on the neck as a lever of the first kind; the first cervical vertebra forming the fulcrum. We rise on tiptoe by a lever of the second kind, the fulcrum being the ground under the toes; and we have examples of a lever of the third kind in the flexion of the forearm on the arm, in the elevation of the arm, &c.

LE'VER, Hysteromoch'lium, Mochlis'cus, Vec'tis obstetric''ius, Vec'tis, (F.) Levier, is an instrument curved at the extremity, and having a fenestra. It is used to assist the extraction of the child's head when instrumental aid is necessary, either as a lever proper or as a tractor. Levers are also used by the dentist for extracting stumps, &c. The Levier de l'Écluse, Langue de Carpe, Trevelin, Pied de biche, Punch, is employed for extracting the molar teeth.

LICHEN, gen. Liche'nis, (λειχην or λιχην, pronounced li'ken.) Exor'mia Li'chen, Lei'chen, Serpi'go, Volat'ica, Pap'ulæ, P. sic'cæ, Peti'go, Pus'tulæ sic'cæ, Sca'bies sic'ca seu a'gria, Lichenī'asis adulto'rum, Li'chenous rash, (F.) Gale sèche, Dartre furfuracée volante, Poussée. The cutaneous affection described under this name by the Greek writers is not clearly defined. Some have believed it to be Impetigo, but this is doubtful. The name is now generally applied to a diffuse eruption of red pimples, accompanied by a troublesome sense of tingling or pricking. Drs. Willan and Bateman define it—"an extensive eruption of papulæ affecting adults, connected with internal disorder, usually terminating in scurf; recurrent, not contagious." One of their varieties, however, the Lichen Tropicus, does not accord well with this definition; for it affects children as well as adults, and is unconnected with internal disorder.

LICHEN A'GRIUS, L. A'gria, Exor'mia Li'chen fe'rus, Li'chen fe'rus, Pap'ula a'gria, Wild Li'chen, is distinguished by pimples in clusters or patches, surrounded by a red halo; the cuticle growing gradually harsh, thickened, and chappy, often preceded by general irritation. In addition to antiphlogistics, a cooling ointment may be used, to allay itching.

LICHEN BARBATUS PLICATUS, L. plicatus.

LICHEN CIRCUMSCRIP'TUS is characterized by clusters or patches of papulæ, having a well defined margin, and an irregularly circular form; continuing for six or eight weeks. These varieties require but little medical treatment. The antiphlogistic plan is all that is necessary.

LICHEN FERUS, Lichen agrius.

LICHEN LIV'IDUS. The papulæ have a dark red or livid hue, without any fever. They are more permanent in this variety. It requires the mineral acids and bark.

LICHEN PILA'RIS, Exor'mia Li'chen pila'ris is merely a modification of the preceding; the papulæ appearing at the roots of the hair.

LICHEN SIM'PLEX, Exor'mia Li'chen sim'plex, consists of an eruption of red papulæ, appearing first on the face or arms, and afterwards extending over the body; preceded for a few days by slight febrile irritation, which usually ceases when the eruption appears,—with an unpleasant sense of tingling during the night. It generally dies away in ten days or a fortnight.

LICHEN TROP'ICUS, Exormia Li'chen trop'icus, Eczes'ma, Es'sera [?], Sudam'ina [?], Prickly Heat, Sum'mer Rash. The pimples are bright red, and of the size of a small pin's head; with heat, itching, and pricking, as if by needles. It is local; produced by excessive heat; and disappears when the weather becomes cooler, or the individual is inured to the climate.

LICHEN URTICA'TUS, L. Urtico'sus, Exor'mia Li'chen urtico'sus, is another variety. The Nettle Li'chen consists of papulæ, accompanied by wheals like those of nettle rash. A variety of this is said to be called, in America, blights.

LIFE, (Sax. lıf, lỳf,) Vi'ta, Bi'os, Bi'otē, Bi'otos, Zo'ē, Pneuma, Spir'itus, (F.) Vie. The state of organized beings, during which, owing to the union of an unknown force with matter, they are capable of performing functions different from those that regulate other natural bodies; all of which functions, however numerous and diversified, work to one end. Life has only a limited duration; beyond which,—the organic functions ceasing to be executed,—the body is given up to the agency of chemical affinity. Hence Bichat has defined life to be—the aggregate of the functions which resist death. On account of the difference that exists among the vital functions, he applied the term Organic Life to the functions, inservient to composition and decomposition;—as digestion, respiration, circulation, calorification, absorption, secretion, and nutrition; and Animal life, to the functions which connect man and animals with external bodies; as the understanding, sensations, locomotion and voice.

LIGATURA, Ligature, Fascia—l. Glandis, Phimosis.

LIG'ATURE, Ligatu'ra, Liga'tio, Alligatu'ra, Deliga'tio, Vinctu'ra, Fas'cia, Epid'esis. This word has various acceptations. It means, 1. The thread with which an artery or vein is tied, to prevent or arrest hemorrhage. 2. The cord, or thread, or wire, used for removing tumours, &c. 3. The bandage used for phlebotomy. Ligature is, also, sometimes applied to the act of tying an artery or considerable vessel—Liga'tion, Deliga'tion; and occasionally we meet with the terms 'to ligature' and 'to ligate,' used unnecessarily in this sense, in place of to take up or tie a vessel. When the artery alone is tied, the ligature is said to be immediate; when any of the surrounding parts are included, it is said to be mediate. The ligature occasions obliteration or adhesion of the arterial parietes, by cutting through the middle and internal coats; the adhesion being favoured by the formation of a coagulum, which acts, in some degree, as a barrier against the impulse of the blood, and subsequently disappears by absorption.

LIGATURE ARTICULÉE, Écraseur.

LIGHT, (Sax. leohτ, lihτ,) (G.) Licht, Lux, Lu'men, Phos, (F.) Lumière. An extremely rare fluid; diffused over the universe; emanating from the sun and fixed stars; traversing more than four millions of leagues in a minute; passing through transparent bodies, which refract it according to their density and combustibility; and arrested by opake bodies, by which it is reflected at an angle equal to the angle of incidence. It is the cause of colour in all bodies, being entirely reflected by white surfaces and absorbed by black. It is decomposed in passing through a transparent prism into seven rays—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, purple, and violet.

Light acts upon the body as a gentle and salutary stimulus. It urges to exercise, whilst privation of it induces sleep and inactivity, and disposes to obesity. Hence it is, that, in rural economy, animals which are undergoing the process of fattening are kept in obscurity. When vegetables are deprived of light, their nutrition is interfered with, and they become etiolated. To a certain extent this applies to animals, and there is every reason to believe, that want of light prevents the due development of organized bodies. It has been found that, when tadpoles were deprived of light, they did not undergo the perfect metamorphosis into the frog, but that monstrosities from arrest of development were induced.

(Velpeau.) A form of this, in plates, or diffused over the mammary integuments, is termed, by M. Velpeau, Squirre en cuirasse.

LIP, (Sax. and Germ. Lippe,) Cheï'los, La'bium, La'brum, (F.) Lèvre. [In Entomology, labium means the lower lip,—labrum, the upper.] The lips are composed of different muscular fasciculi, nerves, and vessels, covered by the skin and mucous membrane of the mouth. They circumscribe the anterior aperture of that cavity; and are inservient to mastication, pronunciation, &c. They are distinguished into upper and lower —Anocheï'lon; and Catocheï'lon, (Prov.) Fipple —and are placed in front of each jaw, forming between them the anterior aperture of the mouth. They unite at each side, and form what are called the angles or commissures of the mouth—Chal'ini. Their free edge is covered with a mucous membrane, of a more or less livid red, according to the individual. They receive their arteries from the external carotid. Their veins open into the two jugulars. Their lymphatic vessels descend into the ganglions situate beneath the chin. Their nerves are derived from the infraorbitar, mental, and facial.

LIPS, La'bia, (F.) Lèvres de la vulve, are folds belonging to the genital organs of the female, and distinguished into—1. La'bia puden'di seu Cun'ni seu majo'ra, Episi'a, A'læ puden'di muli'ebris, Hyrtocheï'lides, Ru'pes, A'læ majo'res, Crem'noi, Pimiac'ula, (F.) Grandes Lèvres. These are two membranous folds, thicker above than below, which limit the vulva laterally, and extend from the inferior part of the mons veneris to the perinæum. They unite anteriorly and posteriorly, forming commissures; the posterior of which is called Fourchette. Their outer surface is convex; formed of skin and covered with hair. The inner surface is white, and covered by a mucous membrane, continuous with that lining the other parts of the vulva. The space between the skin and mucous membrane is filled with a fatty tissue and fibrous bands, some fibres of the constrictor vaginæ muscle, vessels, and nerves. 2. Labia puden'di mino'ra, see Nymphæ.

We speak, also, of the lips of a wound, ulcer, &c., when alluding to the edges of these solutions of continuity.

LITHOTOME, Lithot'omus, (lithos, and τομη, 'an incision.') This name has been given to a number of instruments of different shapes and sizes which are used in the operation for the stone, to cut the neck or body of the bladder. They ought with more propriety to be called Cystotomes.

The Lithotome Caché of Frère Côme is the most known, and is still occasionally used. It is composed of a handle and a flattened sheath, slightly curved: in this there is a cutting blade, which can be forced out, by pressing upon a bascule or lever, to any extent that may be wished by the operator.

A Double Lithotome was used by Dupuytren in his bilateral operation. See Lithotomy.

LITHOT'OMIST, Lithot'omus. One who devotes himself entirely to operating for the stone. One who practises lithotomy.

LITHOT'OMY, Lithotom'ia, Cystotom'ia, Urolithotom'ia, Sec'tio vesica'lis, Lithocystot'omy, (F.) Lithotomie, Taille. The operation by which a stone is extracted from the bladder. The methods according to which this operation may be practised are reducible to five principal, each of which has experienced numerous modifications.

1. The Meth'od of Cel'sus, Meth'odus Celsia'na, Cystotom'ia cum appara'tu par'vo, Appara'tus Mi'nor, Cut'ting on the Gripe. This consisted in cutting upon the stone after having made it project at the perinæum by means of the fingers introduced into the rectum. The method was attended with several inconveniences; such as the difficulty of dividing the parts neatly, injury done to the bladder, as well as the impossibility of drawing down the stone in many persons. It is sometimes also called Meth'odus Guytonia'na; from Guy de Chauliac having endeavored to remove from it the discredit into which it had fallen in his time. It was termed Apparatus Minor, (F.) Le petit appareil, from the small number of instruments required in it.

2. Appara'tus Ma'jor. This method was invented in 1520 by John de Romani, a surgeon of Cremona, and communicated by him to Mariano Santo di Barletta, whence it was long called Maria'no's Meth'od, Sec'tio Maria'na. It was called, also, Appara'tus Ma'jor, and Cystotom'ia seu Meth'odus cum appara'tu mag'no, (F.) Le grand appareil, from the number of instruments required in it. An incision was made on the median line; but the neck of the bladder was not comprehended in it. It was merely dilated. The greater apparatus was liable to many inconveniences; such as ecchymoses; contusion; inflammation of the neck of the bladder; abscesses; urinary fistulæ; incontinence of urine, impotence, &c.

3. The High Opera'tion, Appara'tus al'tus, Cystotom'ia cum appara'tu al'to, C. Hypogas'trica. Epicystotom'ia, Laparocystotom'ia, Sec'tio seu Meth'odus Franconia'na, S. Hypogas'trica seu al'ta, (F.) Haut appareil, Taille Hypogastrique, Taille sus-pubienne, was first practised by Peter Franco, about the middle of the 16th century. It consisted in pushing the stone above the pubis by the fingers introduced into the rectum. Rousset afterwards proposed to make the bladder rise above the pubis by injecting it. The method had fallen into discredit, when Frère Côme revived it. It is used when the calculus is very large. It was practised by opening first the membranous part of the urethra upon the catheter passed into the canal. Through this incision the Sonde à dard—a species of catheter, having a spear-pointed stilet—was introduced into the bladder. An incision was then made into the linea alba, above the symphysis pubis, of about four or five fingers' breadth, and the peritoneum detached to avoid wounding it. The stilet was pushed through the bladder, and used as a director for the knife, with which the bladder was divided anteriorly, as far as the neck; and the stone extracted. It was performed in England by Douglass in 1719, and since by others, with various modifications.

4. The Lat'eral Opera'tion, Hypocysteotom'ia, Cystotom'ia latera'lis, Cystauchenotom'ia, Cystotrachelotom'ia, Urethrocystauchenotom'ia, Urethrocysteotrachelotom'ia, Sec'tio latera'lis, Appara'tus latera'lis, (F.) Appareil lateralisé, so named from the prostate gland and neck of the bladder being cut laterally, was probably invented by Peter Franco. It was introduced into France by Frère Jacques de Beaulieu. He performed it with rude instruments invented by himself, and improved by the suggestions of some of the Parisian surgeons. In England, it received its earliest and most important improvements from the celebrated Cheselden. It is the method practised at the present day, according to different modes of procedure. In this method, the patient is placed upon a table; his legs and thighs are bent and separated; the hands being tied to the feet. The perinæum is then shaved, and a staff is introduced into the bladder, the handle being turned towards the right groin of the patient. An oblique incision is now made from the raphe to the middle of a line drawn from the anus to the tuberosity of the ischium of the left side; and, taking the staff for a guide, the integuments, areolar tissue of the perinæum, membranous portion of the urethra, transversus perinæi muscle, bulbo-cavernosus, some fibres of the levator ani, the prostate and neck of the bladder, are successively divided. For this latter part of the operation, the knife, the beaked bistoury, Bistouri ou Lithotome Caché, cutting gorget, &c., is used, according to the particular preference. The forceps are now introduced into the bladder, and the stone extracted. In the operation care must be taken not to injure the rectum or the great arterial vessels distributed to the perinæum.

A variety of the Lat'eral Appara'tus, called by the French Appareil latéral, consisted in cutting into the bas fond of the bladder, without touching the neck of that organ; but it was soon abandoned, on account of its inconveniences.

The method of Le Cat and of Pajola—Urethrocysteoäneurysmatotom'ia — consists in dividing the prostate in part only,— the enlargement of the wound being effected by a peculiar dilator.

The Bilat'eral Opera'tion is founded on that of Celsus. It consists in making an incision posterior to the bulb of the urethra, and anterior to the anus, involving both sides of the perinæum by crossing the raphe at right angles: an incision is then made through the membranous part of the urethra, and the prostate may be cut bilaterally, either with the double lithotome of Dupuytren, or the prostatic bisector of Dr. Stevens, of New York.

5. Lithotomy by the Rec'tum, Proc'tocystotom'ia, Sec'tio rectovesica'lis, (F.) Taille par la Rectum, Taille postérieure, T. Recto-vésicale. This was proposed by Vegetius in the 16th century; but it was never noticed until M. Sanson, in the year 1817, attracted attention to it; since which time it has been successfully performed in many instances. It consists in penetrating the bladder through the paries corresponding with the rectum by first cutting the sphincter ani and rectum about the root of the penis, and penetrating the bladder by the neck of that organ, dividing the prostate, or by its bas-fond.

Lithotomy in women, from the shortness of the urethra, is a comparativeiy insignificant operation.

LIV'ER, (Sax. lifer,) He'par, Je'cur, Jec''inus, (F.) Foie. The liver is the largest gland in the body. It is an azygous organ; unsymmetrical; very heavy; and of a brownishred colour; occupying the whole of the right hypochondrium, and a part of the epigastrium. Above, it corresponds to the diaphragm; below, to the stomach, transverse colon, and right kidney; behind, to the vertebral column, aorta, and vena cava; and before, to the base of the chest. Its upper surface is convex; the lower, irregularly convex and concave, so that anatomists have divided the organ into three lobes,—a large or right or colic lobe;—a lesser lobe, lobule, or inferior lobe, the Lob'ulus Spige'lii,—and a middle or left lobe. At its inferior surface are observed:—1. A Sul'cus or Fur'row or Fis'sure, called horizontal or longitudinal fissure, Fos'sa Umbilica'lis, Sul'cus an'teroposte'rior Jec'oris seu horizonta'lis Jec'oris seu longitudina'lis Jec'oris seu sinis'ter Jec'oris seu Umbilica'lis, (F.) Sillon horizontal, longitudinal ou de la veine ombilicale, which lodges, in the fœtus, the umbilical vein, and ductus venosus. 2. The Principal Fis'sure, termed Sul'cus Transversus, Fos'sa transver'sa, Trans'verse fos'sa, Si'nus Porta'rum, Por'ta, P. seu Ma'nus Jec'oris seu He'patis, Fos'sa or Fis'sure of the Ve'na por'ta, Por'tal Fis'sure or Fos'sa, (F.) Grande scissure du foie, Sillon transversal ou de la veine porte, Hile du foie, which receives the sinus of the vena porta. 3. The Fissure of the Ve'na Ca'va infe'rior, (F.) Sillon ou Gouttiere de la veine cave inférieure, situate at the posterior margin of the organ, and lodging the vena cava inferior. 4. The Lob'ulus Spige'lii or poste'rior por'tal em'inence. 5. The ante'rior por'tal em'inence, Auri'ga seu Lob'ulus anon'ymus. 6. Depressions corresponding to the upper surface of the stomach, gallbladder, arch of the colon, right kidney, &c. Continued from the fossa umbilicalis is a small fossa called Fos'sa duc'tûs veno'si, between the left lobe and Lobulus Spigelii. The posterior margin of the liver is very thick; much more so than the anterior. The liver is surrounded by a serous or peritoneal covering, which forms for it a suspensory or broad ligament and two lateral and triangular ligaments. See Falx. The bloodvessels of the liver are very numerous. The hepatic artery and vena porta furnish it with the blood necessary for its nutrition and the secretion of bile. The hepatic veins convey away the blood which has served those purposes. The lymphatic vessels are very numerous; some being superficial; others deepseated. The nerves are also numerous, and proceed from the pneumogastric, diaphragmatic, and the hepatic plexuses.

The intimate structure of the parenchyma of the liver has been well studied. When cut, it presents a porous appearance, owing to the division of a multitude of small vessels. When torn, it seems formed of granulations;—the intimate structure of which has given rise to many hypotheses. In these granulations are contained the radicles of the excretory ducts of the bile; the union of which constitutes the hepatic duct. According to Mr. Kiernan, the intimate structure consists of a number of lobules—hepatic lobules, hepatic islets—(F.) Lobules hépatiques, Îlots du foie, Lob'ulins—composed of intralobular or hepatic veins—ve'næ intralobula'res seu centra'les—which convey the blood back that has been subservient to the secretion of bile. The interlobular plexus of veins—ve'næ interlobula'res—is formed by branches of the vena porta, which contain both the blood of the vena porta and of the hepatic artery; both of which, according to Mr. Kiernan, furnish the pabulum of the biliary secretion. The biliary ducts form likewise an interlobular plexus, having an arrangement similar to that of the interlobular veins. Mr. Kiernan's views are embraced by many anatomists; but are denied by others.

The liver is, perhaps, the only organ which, independently of the red blood carried to it by the hepatic artery, receives black blood by the vena porta. The general opinion is, that the blood of the vena porta furnishes the bile, whilst the hepatic artery affords blood for the nutrition of the liver. It is probable, however, that bile is secreted from the blood of the latter vessel. Besides bile, the liver forms sugar, and is a great assimilating organ.

The liver is liable to a number of diseases. The principal are—hepatitis or inflammation, cancer, biliary calculi, encysted and other tumours or tubercles, hydatids, &c.; and it has at times been the fashion to regard it as the cause of symptoms with which it is no wise connected.

The terms whis'ky liv'er, gindrinkers' liv'er, and gin liv'er, occasionally applied to it, are, consequently, not distinctive. Under the name Pig'ment liv'er, Frerichs describes the liver as it sometimes appears in those who die from the effects of malarious fevers; when it is of a steel gray or blackish, or, not unfrequently, chocolate colour; brown insulated figures on a dark ground—a condition, which "is produced by an accumulation of pigment matter in the vascular apparatus of the gland."

LONGEV'ITY, Longæ'vitas, (F.) Longévité, (longus, 'long,' and ævum, 'age.') Macrobio'sis, Macrobi'otes. The prolongation of existence to an advanced age. Haller collected examples of more than one thousand centenarians. He had knowledge of sixty-two persons aged from 110 to 120 years; of twenty-nine, from 120 to 130 years; and of fifteen, who had attained from 130 to 140 years. Beyond this advanced age, examples of longevity are much more rare and less sufficiently attested.

Longevity also means length or dura'tion of life, (F.) Durée de la vie. The mean age at death, (F.) Vie moyenne, of different classes and professions enables an estimate to be formed of the expectation or value of life in each.

LONGIS'SIMUS DOR'SI, Semispina'tus, (F.) Lombo-dorso-trachélien, Portion costo-trachélienne du sacro-spinal (Ch.), Long dorsal, Long du dos, is situate vertically at the posterior part of the trunk, and fills, in a great measure, the vertebral furrows. It is thick and almost square below; thin and pointed above. It is attached to the posterior surface of the sacrum, to the transverse processes of all the lumbar and dorsal vertebræ, and to the inferior margin of the last 7 or 8 ribs. It maintains the vertebral column in a straight position; straightens it when bent forwards, and can even carry it back. It also assists in the rotatory motion of the trunk.

LONGISSIMUS FEMORIS, Sartorius — l. Oculi, Obliquus superior oculi.

LONGSIGHTEDNESS, Presbytia.

LON'GUS COL'LI, ('long [muscle] of the neck,') (F.) Pré-dorso-cervical, Pré-dorso-atloïdien, (Ch.,) Long du cou. This muscle is situate at the anterior and superior part of the vertebral column. It is long, flat, and broader at its middle than at its extremities, which are pointed. It is attached to the anterior surface of the bodies of the first three dorsal and last six cervical vertebræ; to the intervertebral ligaments; to the anterior edge of the transverse processes of the last five cervical vertebræ; and to the tubercle on the anterior arch of the first. This muscle bends the cervical vertebræ upon each other and upon the dorsal vertebræ. If the upper portion acts on one side only, it occasions the rotation of the atlas on the vertebra dentata; and, consequently, of the head on the neck.

LUMBAR AB'SCESS, Pso'as ab'scess, Aposte'ma psoät'icum, Abscess'us lumbo'rum, Mor'bus psoäd'icus. This abscess is so called from the matter being found on the side of the psoas muscle, or betwixt that and the iliacus internus. Between these muscles is a quantity of loose, areolar substance; and when an abscess takes place there, it can find no outlet except by a distant course. Generally, it descends along the psoas muscle, forming a swelling immediately beneath Poupart's ligament; at times, however, it extends down the thigh under the fascia. Severe hectic follows the bursting of the abscess, and often death. Its causes are,—scrofula, injury to the loins, &c.

When, from the pain of the back continuing for some time, with other symptoms, the disease is suspected, caustics, or the moxa, applied opposite the transverse processes of the lumbar vertebræ, may be recommended; and, when the abscess is ready for opening, it may be emptied by repeated discharges of the matter, through a small opening, made with a lancet, or small, lancetpointed trocar. The medical treatment consists in supporting the system, under the great reparative efforts required of it.

LUMBAR AR'TERIES are four or five in number on each side. They arise from the sides of the abdominal aorta, and pass behind the muscles situate in front of the lumbar portion of the spine, to gain the broad muscles of the abdomen. They give off, 1. Spinal branches. 2. Anterior, posterior, and external muscular branches.

LUMBAR NERVES are five in number, and issue from the vertebral column by the spinal foramina of the loins. The first lumbar nerve gives off three branches:—the external or ilioscrotal; the middle or inguinocutaneous, and the internal or infrapubian. Along with the three pairs below it, it forms the lumbar plexus.

LUMBAR PLEX'US, Portion lombaire du plexus crural (Ch.), Plexus Lombo-abdominal. This plexus is formed by the union of the Rami communican'tes of the anterior branches of the first four lumbar nerves. It is situate behind the psoas muscle, and before the transverse processes of the lumbar vertebræ. It furnishes, besides the branches which proceed from the first pair, several filaments, that are distributed to the psoas muscle, to the iliacus, the integuments, and glands of the groin; and three great branches,—the crural, obturator, and lumbosacral.

These muscles surround the lumbar region of the vertebral column. The vessels, nerves, &c. of the loins, are called lumbar.

LUMBOCOSTALIS, Sacrospinalis.

LUM'BOSA'CRAL. Belonging to the lumbar and sacral regions. (F.) Lombo-sacré. Bichat calls thus a very large nerve, given off from the anterior branch of the fifth lumbar pair, which descends into the pelvis before the sacrum to join the sciatic plexus.

Four small, fleshy, thin, round, long, fusiform fasciculi, situate in the palm of the hand, and distinguished into first, second, third, and fourth, counting from without to within. They arise from the tendons of the flexor communis digitorum, and are inserted at the outer and posterior side of the superior extremity of the first phalanges of the last four fingers. These muscles bend the fingers on the metacarpus, and fix the tendons of the flexor digitorum communis.

LYMPH, Lymph'a, (akin to νυμφη, 'water,' by changing ν into λ.) White blood, Lymph'a Nutri"tia, (F.) Lymphe. A name given to the fluid contained in the lymphatic vessels and thoracic duct of animals, which have been made to fast for 24 hours. According to Chevreul, the lymph of the dog contains water, fibrin, albumen, common salt, subcarbonate of soda, phosphates of lime and magnesia, and carbonate of lime. The properties and composition of lymph vary somewhat according to the part whence the lymphatic vessels obtain it. Generally, it is under the form of a transparent, slightly alkaline fluid, sometimes of a madder-red or yellowish colour,—of a spermatic odour, and saline taste; soluble in water,—the solution becoming turbid, when mixed with alcohol. When left to itself, it coagulates. The clot or solid portion becomes of a scarlet red, if put in contact with oxygen; and of a purple red, if placed in carbonic acid.

Like the blood, the lymph consists of a fluid—Li'quor lymph'æ—in which lymph corpuscles or globules are suspended.

The lymph is probably the product of internal absorption in different parts of the body: it then flows along the lymphatic vessels, uniting with the chyle, and is poured with it into the veins; thus becoming one of the materials of the blood. According to others, the blood, when it reaches the arterial radicles, is divided into two portions, —the one red, which is carried to the heart,—the other serous or white, which is absorbed by the lymphatic vessels, and constitutes the lymph. By others, again, the lymphatics are considered to be the vessels of return for the white blood sent to certain tissues. White blood, however, has probably no existence.

The word lymph is sometimes used unhappily by the surgeon to signify liquor sanguinis.

LYMPHATIC SYSTEM is that particular system of organs which is inservient to the formation and circulation of lymph. These organs are:

1. LYMPHATIC GANG'LIONS OR GLANDS, see Conglobate.

2. LYMPHATIC VES'SELS, Lymphæduc'tus, Lymphangi'a, Lymphangio'a, Ve'næ lymphat'icæ, Duc'tus sero'si, Va'sa lymphatica seu resorben'tia seu hydrago'ga, Hydrangi'a. These are very numerous. Arising at the surface of membranes and in the tissue of the organs, they carry into the veins the lymph from those parts. Lymphatic vessels are found in almost every part. Wherever they are met with, however, they form two orders,—one superficial, the other deepseated;—the two orders frequently communicating with each other. Lymphatic vessels are generally smaller than arteries and veins. They are very thin, diaphanous, and cylindrical; but present, here and there, more or less considerable dilatations, caused by valves in their interior. They are slightly tortuous in their course; their anastomoses are very numerous, and they often cross each other, forming successive plexuses. Of the arrangement of the extreme radicles we are ignorant. All the branches, before joining the principal trunks, pass through lymphatic ganglions, in which they are convoluted, or subdivided almost ad infinitum. They are formed of an outer areolar membrane and an internal coat, similar to that of the veins; of the latter, the valves are formed. All the lymphatics of the body ultimately discharge themselves at the junction of the subclavian and internal jugular veins. Two of these trunks are considerably larger than the others,—the thoracic duct, and the great trunk of the right side, (F.) La grande veine lymphatique droite. The former receives the lymphatics of the abdomen, of the lower extremities, the left side of the thorax, the left upper extremity, and the corresponding side of the head and neck; the latter receives those of the right upper extremity, and of the right side of the head, neck and thorax.

(F.) Aimant, Pierre d'Aimant. The magnet or loadstone. An amorphous, oxydulated ore of iron, which exerts an attraction on unmagnetized iron, and has the property of exhibiting poles; that is, of pointing by one of its extremities to the north. This ore, by constant or long rubbing, communicates its properties to iron; and thus artificial magnets are formed. Magnetic ore is found in many countries, and particularly in the island of Elba. The magnet is sometimes used to extract spicula of iron from the eye or from wounds. It has been employed as an antispasmodic; but acts only through the imagination. The powder has been given as a tonic. In Pharmacy, it is used to purify iron filings. It attracts the iron, and the impurities remain behind. It formerly entered, as an ingredient, into several plasters, to draw bullets and heads of arrows from the body—as the Emplas'trum divi'num Nicola'i, the Emplas'trum ni'grum of Augsburg, the Opodel'doch, and Attracti'vum of Paracelsus, &c.

Magnetic Flu'id. A name given to the imponderable fluid to which the magnet owes its virtues. By analogy it is applied to a particular principle, supposed to be the source of organic actions, which affects, it is conceived, the nervous system principally, and is susceptible of being transmitted from one living body to another, by contact or simple approximation, and especially under the influence of fixed volition. See Magnetism, Animal.

Mayo), Anthropomagnetis'mus, Gar'galē, Gargalis'mus, Gar'galus. Properties attributed to the influence of a particular principle, which has been compared to that which characterizes the magnet. It is supposed to be transmitted from one person to another, and to impress peculiar modifications on organic action, especially on that of the nerves. The discussions, to which this strange belief has given rise, are by no means terminated. There is no evidence whatever of the existence of such a fluid. Highly impressible persons can be thrown into a kind of hysteric or 'magnetic' sleep and somnambulism, designated by Mr. Braid, hyp'notism, neurohyp'notism, and nervous sleep, and at times called, after him, Braid'ism; but farther than this, the efforts of the magnetizer cannot reach. It is a mode of action upon the nerves through the medium of the senses.

The fe'male breast, Pap, Pappe, (Mammil'la, Mamil'la being the male breast), (F.) Mamelle. A glandular organ proper to a class of animals—the mammalia—and intended for the secretion of milk. The mammæ exist in both sexes, but they acquire a much greater size in the female, especially during pregnancy and lactation. In women, before the age of puberty, the breasts are but little developed. At this period, however, towards the central part of each breast, the skin suddenly changes colour, and assumes a rosy tint. It is of a reddish brown in women who have suckled several children. This circle has a rugous appearance, owing to the presence of sebaceous glands, and is called Arc'ola or Aure'ola. These glands — Tu'bercles of the Are'ola of Sir Astley Cooper—furnish an unctuous fluid for defending the nipple from the action of the mouth of the sucking infant. In the midst of the aureola is the nipple, a conoidal eminence, of a rosy tint, susceptible of erection, and at the surface of which the galactopherous ducts open. Besides the skin covering them, the breasts are also composed of a layer of fatty areolar tissue, more or less thick; of a large gland; excretory ducts; vessels, nerves, &c. See Mammary.

In the animal the mamma is called the Ud'der, U'ber, the Bag, (Prov.) Ycwer.

The breasts plus the space between are called the bosom, si'nus, col'pus. At times these terms are restricted to the space between the breasts. (F.) Sein.

Mamma also means a nurse.

MAMMARY ABSCESS, Mastodynia apostematosa.

MAMMARY AR'TERIES are three in number. They are distinguished into—1. The Internal Mam'mary, Arte'ria sterna'lis, A. Sous-sternal (Ch.), Internal thorac''ic. It arises from the subclavian, and descends obliquely inwards, from its origin to the cartilage of the third rib. Below the diaphragm it divides into two branches; the one external, the other internal. From its origin until its bifurcation, it gives branches to the muscles and glands of the neck, to the thymus, mediastinum, pericardium, and œsophagus. In each intercostal space it gives off internal and external musculo-cutaneous branches, and also on each side the superior diaphragmatic. Its two ultimate branches are distributed on the parietes of the abdomen, and anastomose with the external mammary, intercostal, lumbar, circumflexa ilii, and epigastric arteries. 2. The Exter'nal Mam'mary Ar'teries are two in number, and are distinguished into superior and inferior. The supe'rior exter'nal mam'mary, First of the thorac''ics (Ch.), Superior external thoracic, Superior thoracic, is furnished by the axillary artery. It descends obliquely forwards between the pectoralis major and pectoralis minor, to which it is distributed by a considerable number of branches. The infe'rior exter'nal mam'mary, the sec'ond of the thorac''ics (Ch.), Long or inferior thoracic, arises from the axillary artery, a little below the preceding. It descends vertically over the lateral part of the thorax; curves afterwards inwards; becomes subcutaneous, and divides into a number of branches, which surround the breast. It gives branches to the pectoralis major, serratus major anticus, the intercostal muscles, the glands of the axilla, and the integuments of the breast.

MAMMARY GLAND, Glan'dula lactif'era, Masta'den, is the secretory organ of the milk. It is situate in the substance of the breast, to which it gives shape. The tissue of this gland results from the assemblage of lobes of different size, united intimately by a dense areolar tissue. Each of these is composed of several lobules, formed of round granulations, of a rosy white colour, and of the size of a poppy seed. The glandular grains give rise to the radicles of the excretory canals of the mamma, which are called galactoph'orous or lactif'erous. These excretory vessels unite in ramusculi, rami, and in trunks of greater or less size; collect towards the centre of the gland; are tortuous, very extensible, and semitransparent. All terminate in sinuses, situate near the base of the nipple, which are commonly from 15 to 18 in number. These sinuses are very short, conical, and united by areolar tissue. From their summits a fasciculus of new ducts sets out, which occupy the centre of the nipple and open separately at its surface. The arteries of the mammary gland come from the thoracic, axillary, intercostal, and internal mammary. The veins accompany the arteries; the nerves are furnished by the intercostals and brachial plexus; the lymphatic vessels are very numerous, and form two layers. They communicate with those of the thorax, and pass into the axillary ganglions.

MAMMARY SARCO'MA, Mas'toid sarco'ma of Abernethy, Emphy'ma sarco'ma mamma'rum. A tumour, of the colour and texture of the mammary gland; dense and whitish; sometimes softer and brownish; often producing on extirpation a malignant ulcer with indurated edges. Found in various parts of the body and limbs.

MAMMARY VEINS follow the same course as the arteries, and have received the same denominations. The inter'nal mam'mary vein of the right side opens into the superior cava; that of the left into the corresponding subclavian vein. The exter'nal mam'mary veins open into the axillary vein.

MAMMILLARY EM'INENCE is a name given, 1. To more or less marked prominences on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the anfractuosities of the cranium. 2. To white, round, medullary tubercles of the size of a pea, situate at the base of the brain, behind the gray substance from which the Tige pituitaire of the French anatomists arises. These Mam'millary Tu'bercles, Cor'pora albican'tia seu candican'tia seu mammilla'ria seu risifor'mia, Bul'bi for'nicis, Mammil'læ seu *Glob'uli medulla're*s, Prominen'tiæ albican'tes, *Proces'sus mammilla're*s cer'ebri, *Protensio'nes glandulu're*s, Eminen'tiæ candican'tes, Prio'rum cru'rum for'nicis bul'bi, Wil'lis's Glands, (F.) Bulbes de la voûte à trois piliers, Tubercles pisiformes (Ch.), are united to each other by a small grayish band, which corresponds with the third ventricle. They receive the anterior prolongations of the fornix.

Some ancient anatomists, taking the nervous trunks, to which Willis first gave the name of olfactory nerves, for simple appendages of the brain, called them on account of their shape, *Carun'culæ mammilla're*s. Vesalius, Fallopius, Columbus, and several others, termed them *Proces'sus mammilla're*s *cer'ebri ad na're*s. They have also been called Trigo'na olfacto'ria.

MANGANÈSE OXYDE NOIR DE, Manganese, black oxide of.

MANGANESE, SUL'PHATE OF, Mangane'sii Sul'phas seu Protox'idi Sul'phas, Sul'phate of Protox'ide of Man'ganese. A rosecoloured and very soluble salt, isomorphous with sulphate of magnesia. It is prepared on a large scale for the use of the dyer, by heating, in a close vessel, peroxide of manganese and coal, and dissolving the impure protoxide, thus obtained, in sulphuric acid, with the addition of a little chlorohydric acid towards the end of the process. The solution is evaporated to dryness, and again exposed to a red heat, by which the persulphate of iron is decomposed. Water then dissolves the pure sulphate of manganese, leaving the oxide of iron behind.

This salt has been recommended as a cholagogue, in doses of a drachm or two.

The salts of manganese have been prescribed in chlorosis and amenorrhœa, and as substitutes for chalybeates generally. The subcarbonate and the oxide have been chiefly employed. The chloride is the basis of Mr. James Young's disinfectant.

With some, it means insanity. Disorder of the intellect, in which there is erroneous judgment or hallucination, which impels to acts of fury. If the raving be not directed to a single object, it is mania properly so called; if to one object, it constitutes monomania, which term is, however, usually given to melancholy. Mania attacks adults chiefly; and women more frequently than men. The prognosis is unfavourable. About onethird never recover; and they who do are apt to relapse. Separation is one of the most effective means of treatment, with attention to the corporeal condition and every thing that can add to the mental comfort of the patient, and turn his thoughts away from the subjects of his delusion. In the violence of the paroxysms, recourse must be had to the strait waistcoat, the shower bath, &c. Separation should be continued for some weeks during convalescence, with the view of preventing a relapse.

MANIA, DANC''ING. Danc''ing plague. A form of convulsion, which has appeared, at various times, epidemically under the form of St. Vitus's dance, St. John's dance, Tarantism, Hysteria, Tigretier (in Abyssinia), and diseased sympathy; and which has been fully described by Hecker in his 'Epidemics of the Middle Ages.' By walking backwards, until the distance from the object is about five times as great as the distance between the two objects, the latter will be found to disappear. Mariotte and, after him, many ophthalmologists, inferred that the optic nerve, on which the ray doubtless falls in this experiment, is insensible; and hence that the choroid may be the seat of vision,—not the retina. The inference is illogical; for it doubtless falls on the part of the optic nerve without doubt, where the central artery enters, and the central vein leaves the eyeball, and where there is necessarily no neurine.

MARSH, (Sax. mepe,) Lim'nē, He'lus, Pa'lus, (F.) Marais. Marshy districts give off emanations, which are the fruitful source of disease and the cause of great insalubrity in many countries. The chief disease, occasioned by the malaria or miasm, is intermittent fever. Hence it becomes important to drain such regions, if practicable. Some marshy countries are not so liable to phthisis pulmonalis, and it has been found, that where intermittents have been got rid of by draining, consumption has, at times, become frequent. The most unhealthy periods for residence in a marshy district are during the existence of the summer and autumnal heats; at which times the water becomes evaporated, and the marshy bottom is more or less exposed to the sun's rays. This postulatum seems necessary for the production of the miasmata: for whilst the marsh is well covered with water, no miasm is given off.

MATE'RIA MED'ICA, Pharmacolog''ia, Pharmacol'ogy, Acol'ogy or Akol'ogy or Aceology''ia, Hylē Iat'rice, Iamatolog''ia, Iamatol'ogy, (F.) Matière Médicale. The division of medical science which treats of the knowledge of medicines; their action on the animal economy, and mode of administration. The study of the Materia Medica is one of great importance;—it is a study of the tools with which the practitioner has to work in the cure of disease. Much labour has been spent in contriving classifications of the Materia Medica. Some have arranged the articles according to their natural resemblances: others according to their real or presumed virtues: others, according to their active constituent principles. The Pharmacopœias place them alphabetically. Perhaps the best classification would be one founded on the agency exerted by the articles on the different tissues; but this arrangement, in the present state of science, is by no means easy; and, moreover, ideas in regard to the action of medicines are so associated with certain terms,—as narcotics, tonics, sedatives, &c., employed to denote certain operations, which they are esteemed capable of producing, that, to abandon them, would be to throw obstacles in the way of the student, without the ultimate advantage accruing to him of possessing a better knowledge of the modus operandi of medicines than when a classification, somewhat resembling those usually embraced, is adopted.

The following is the classification given by the Author, in his "General Therapeutics and Materia Medica," 6th edit., Philad., 1857:—

1. Agents that affect prominently the alimentary canal or its contents.	Emetics, Cathartics, Anthelmintics.
2. Agents that affect prominently the respiratory organs,	Expectorants.

3. Agents that affect prominently the follicular or glandular organs,	Errhines, Sialogogues, Diuretics, Antilithics, Diaphoretics.
4. Agents that affect prominently the nervous system,	Narcotics, Tetanics, Antispasmodics.
5. Agents that affect prominently the organs of reproduction,	Emmenagogues, Parturifacients.
6. Agents that affect various organs,	Excitants, Tonics, Astringents, Sedatives, Refrigerants, Revellents, Eutrophics.
7. Agents whose action is prominently chemical,	Antacids, Antalkalies, Disinfectants.
8. Agents whose action is prominently mechanical,	Demulcents, Diluents.

Of old, the Materia Medica consisted of more articles than at present. The tendency, indeed, is, and must be, to diminish it still further; to get rid of those articles which possess no advantages over others equally common, or whose properties are doubtful. In a dictionary, it becomes necessary to insert all that have been reputed to possess virtues; but the majority are unnecessary. The catalogue might be largely reduced with impunity.

MAXILLARY AR'TERIES are three in number. 1. Exter'nal maxillary. See Facial. 2. Inter'nal max'illary — A. Gutturo-maxillaire (Ch.). This arises from the external carotid with the temporal. It is remarkable for its complex course, and for the number of branches which it transmits to the deep-seated parts of the face. Immediately after its origin, it buries itself under the neck of the lower jaw, curving inwards and downwards. It then advances directly inwards; proceeding in the space between the two pterygoid muscles towards the maxillary tuberosity. It turns again, becomes vertical, and ascends into the bottom of the zygomatic fossa, until, having arrived at the floor of the orbit, it takes a horizontal and transverse direction; enters the sphenomaxillary fossa, and divides into several branches. See Artery, (table.)

MAXILLARY BONE, Maxil'la, Mandib'ula, Gam'phē, Gum'phelē, Gna'thus, Mo'la, Si'agon, Jaw'bone, (Prov.) Chaff'bone, Chall, Chanle, Chavel, Chaw'bone, Gill. (F.) Mâchoire. A name given to two bones, which support the teeth, and, by means of them, are inservient to the cutting, bruising, and tearing of alimentary substances.

MAXILLARY BONE, INFE'RIOR, Low'er jawbone, Os Maxilla'rē infe'rius, Maxil'la infe'rior, Hyposi'agon, (F.) Os maxillaire (Ch.), Mâchoire diacranienne, is a symmetrical, nearly parabolic bone, the middle portion of which is horizontal, and called the body; and the posterior is vertical, the angular portions being termed Rami or branches. These have behind a parotidean edge, which forms —by uniting with the base—the angle of the jaw. The branches terminate above by two processes, separated by the sigmoid notch or fossa; the anterior of which is called the coronoid; the posterior, the condyloid process or maxillary condyle, supported by a Cer'vix, Col'lum, or Neck. The chief parts observed in the lower jaw are—1. Externally,—the Sym'physis men'ti, Apoph'ysis men'ti, Men'tal fora'men, and the external oblique' line. 2. Internally,—the Genian-apoph'ysis, the intern'al or My'loid oblique lines, and the entrance of the dental canal. The lower jaw has, also, an alveolar edge, which contains alveoli for the reception of the teeth. The lower jawbone is developed by two points of ossification, which unite at the symphysis of the chin. It is articulated with the temporal bone and with the teeth.

MAXILLARY BONE, SUPE'RIOR, Upper jawbone, Maxil'la supe'rior seu syncra'nia, Os maxilla'rē supe'rius, (F.) Os sus-maxillaire (Ch.), Machoire syncranienne. The upper jawbones are to the face what the sphenoid bone is to the cranium. They are articulated with all the portions composing it. They determine, almost alone, the shape of the face, and give it solidity. Their size is considerable; form unequal. They occupy the middle and anterior part of the face; and enter into the composition of the nasal fossæ, orbit, and mouth. The chief parts observable in the upper jaw are—1. Externally,—the Na'sal proc''ess, Proces'sus nasa'lis seu fronta'lis seu ascen'dens, (F.) Apophyse montante, the supe'rior or or'bital surface, Superfic''ies orbita'lis, Pla'num orbita'lē, which forms almost the entire floor of the orbit, the Fora'men infra-örbita'rium, Zygomat'ic proc''ess, Canine' or Myr'tiform fos'sa. 2. Internally,—the Pal'atine proc''ess, Ante'rior pal'atine canal', and the An'trum of High'more. Its circumference is very unequal, and it has behind a round, unequal prominence, called the Max'illary tuberos'ity, which is pierced by the posterior dental canal. Anteriorly, there is a notch, which forms part of the anterior aperture of the nasal fossæ, and beneath, an eminence, called the anterior nasal spine. The lower part of this circumference forms the alve'olar marg''in. Each superior maxillary bone is articulated with the ethmoid, frontal, nasal, lachrymal, palatine, inferior spongy, vomer, its fellow, the teeth of the upper jaw, and sometimes the sphenoid bone. It is developed by four or five points of ossification.

MAXILLARY NERVES are two in number, and formed of the second and third branches of the fifth pair. The Supe'rior Max'illary Nerve, Nerf sus-maxillaire (Ch.), arises from the middle of the gangliform enlargement of the fifth pair; passes forwards, and issues from the cranium through the foramen rotundum of the sphenoid bone; enters the sphenomaxillary fossa, which it crosses horizontally; passes into the infraorbitar canal, which it traverses; and makes its exit to vanish on the cheek. It gives off the following branches,—the or'bitar, a branch which goes to the sphenopalatine ganglion; posterior dental branches; the anterior dental,—and terminates in the infraor'bitar nerves, which are divided into superior, inferior, and internal. The infe'rior max'illary nerve, Nerf maxillaire (Ch.), is the largest of the three branches furnished by the fifth pair. It issues from the cranium by the foramen ovale of the sphenoid. Having reached the zygomatic fossa, it divides into two trunks; the one superior and external, which gives off the temporales profundi, masseterine, buccal, and pterygoids;—the other — inferior and internal — the larger of the two, which furnishes the inferior dental, lingual, and auricular.

MAXILLARY VEINS present the same arrangement as the arteries they accompany.

The fifth and sixth cervical pairs also send it a branch, which separates from the musculocutaneous nerve. The median nerve descends the inner part of the arm along the biceps muscle. Opposite the elbow joint it buries itself behind the aponeurosis of that muscle, and engages itself between the two fasciculi of the pronator teres. Lower down, it is situate between the flexors — sublimis and profundus—and passes, with their tendons, under the anterior annular ligament; it then divides into five branches, which are distributed to the muscles of the thenar eminence, to the lumbricales, the integuments of the thumb, the index, middle finger, and outer part of the ring finger. This nerve gives no branches to the arm. In the forearm, it furnishes filaments to all the pronator and flexor muscles; and one of them accompanies the anterior interosseous artery. It also gives off a filament to the integuments of the palm of the hand.

A membranous space formed by the approximation of the pleuræ, dividing the chest into two parts, the one right, the other left. The mediastinum, formed by a double reflection of the pleura, extends from the spine to the posterior surface of the sternum. Its anterior part, called Anterior mediastinum, Mediastinum pectora'lē, lodges, at its upper part, the thymus gland in the fœtus, and is filled below with fatty areolar tissue. Its posterior part, parallel to the spine, is occupied by the œsophagus, vena azygos, thoracic duct, the lower part of the windpipe, the origin of the bronchia and a number of lymphatic glands. This part is called the posterior mediastinum—Mediastinum dorsa'lē.

By some anatomists, Mediastinum is defined to be the pleural walls of the membranous space, whilst the space itself is termed Ca'vum mediasti'ni.

The medullary substance that lies within the cranium upon the basiliary process of the occipital bone. The anterior surface which rests in the basilary groove, is impressed by the basilary artery. At the upper extremity, and on its posterior surface are the Tubercula quadrigemina. At the same extremity, the medulla gives rise to two prolongations, the Pedunctes of the brain, separated from each other by the mammillary eminences, and becoming lost in the optic thalami. The lower extremity is called the tail or Rachid'ian bulb, Bul'bus medull'æ spina'lis seu rachid'icus (F.) Bulbe rachidien, and is continuous with the medulla spinalis. It is to this part only that some anatomists apply the name Medulla oblongata. From the posterior angles two other prolongations arise, called Pedunctes of the cerebellum. The medulla oblongata has several eminences—the Pons varo'lii, Cor'pora pyramida'lia, C. oliva'ria, &c.—and it has a longitudinal fissure before, and another behind, called the anterior and the posterior median fissure. The vesicular neurine in the centre of the medulla is the nervous centre of respiration and deglutition: hence it has been called cen'trum vita'lē.

MEDULLA OSSIUM, Marrow—m. Spinæ, M. spinalis.

It commences at the foramen magnum of the occipital bone, and descends in the vertebral canal as low as the 2d lumbar vertebra, without filling it; presenting, in its course, several evident enlargements. It is grooved on both its anterior and posterior surfaces by a furrow, which divides it, in its whole length, into two great nervous cords, intimately united with each other. It terminates by an oval tubercle, whence a number of nerves set out called Caud'a equi'na, (F.) Queue de cheval, from its resemblance to a horse's tail. The spinal marrow has no analogy, as regards its structure, with the marrow of long bones. It is formed of two substances; one white, the other gray, presenting an inverse arrangement to that which they have in the brain, the white being external, the gray at the centre, Substan'tia gri'sea centra'lis. It is enveloped by a yellowish, fibrous membrane, very resisting, which seems to be continued insensibly from the pia mater, and by two other membranes, which are merely pro longations of the arachnoid and dura mater. See Nerve.

MEDULLA VERTEBRALIS, M. spinalis.

This membrane has been considered as a species of internal periosteum of those bones. It has numerous vessels, which bury themselves in the thickness of the marrow; and others which nourish the innermost plates of the bone. The cells formed by it are termed Cel'lulæ seu Sac'culi medulla'res.

He distinguishes two species of medullary systems; the one occupies the cellular tissue at the extremities of the long bones and that of the flat and short bones; the other is found merely in the central canal of long bones.

Medullary Tumour of the Lungs, Phthisis, cancerous.

MEDULLI'TIS, (medulla and itis,) Myelitis. M. Gerdy uses Médullite for inflammation of the marrow of bones, Osteomyeli'tis;—Myelitis being usually appropriated to inflammation of the spinal marrow.

MEM'BRANE, Membra'na, Hy'men, Me'ninx, Epen'dyma, Pannic'ulus, Pan'niele. A name given to different thin organs, representing a species of supple, more or less elastic, webs; varying in their structure and vital properties, and intended, in general, to absorb or secrete certain fluids; and to separate, envelop, and form other organs. Bichat has divided the membranes into simple and compound.

Simple membranes comprise three orders. 1. Mu'cous mem'brane, Membra'na muco'sa seu pituito'sa seu pituita'ria, Phleg'mymen, Blen'nymen, Phlegmat'hymen, Myeoderma, (F.) Muqueuse, Membrane muqueuse, Membrane folliculeuse (Ch.), is so called, on account of the mucous fluid by which it is constantly lubricated. Mucous membranes line the canals, cavities, and hollow organs, which communicate externally by different apertures on the skin. Bichat refers them to two great divisions—the gastropulmonary, and the genitoürinary. The mucous membranes have a striking analogy with the cutaneous tissue, in organization, functions, and diseases. They are composed of corium, papillæ, and epidermis; and are furnished with a multitude of follicles, which secrete a viscid humour,—mucus. They receive a quantity of arterial vessels, veins, lymphatics, and nerves. 2. The Se'rous mem'branes, Membra'næ sero'sæ, Orrhohym'enes, Orrhym'enes, M. villeuses simples (Ch.), are transparent, thin, and composed of one lamina. One surface adheres to other textures; the other is smooth, polished, and moistened by a serous fluid. They are arranged —in the form of sacs without apertures—as great, intermediate reservoirs for the exhalant and absorbent systems, in which the serous fluid, in passing from one system, tarries some time before it enters the other. The serous membranes resemble the areolar membrane in structure and diseases. They facilitate the motion on each other of the organs which they envelop. They may be divided into (a) Serous membranes, properly so called; as the arachnoid, pleura, peritoneum, and tunica vaginalis. (b) Synovial membranes or capsules; which belong to joints, tendons, aponeuroses, &c. These membranes—mucous and serous — are constituted of similar layers — epithelium, basement membrane, condensed areolar tissue; and a looser form of areolar tissue, termed submucous in one case, — subserous in the other. 3. Fi'brous mem'branes, Membranes albugineuses (Ch.) These are almost all continuous, and terminate at the periosteum—their common centre. They have been divided into two sections. 1. Enveloping aponeuro'ses, Aponeuro'ses of insertion, Fi'brous cap'sules of the joints, and Fi'brous sheaths of tendons. 2. The Perios'teum, Du'ra ma'ter, Sclerot'iea, Tu'nica albugin'ea tes'tis, Fi'brous mem'brane of the spleen, &c. The fibrous membranes are not free or moistened by any particular fluid. They adhere by both surfaces to the neighbouring parts; are firm, resisting, but slightly elastic, and of a white colour; sometimes pearly and glistening. Their vessels are numerous, in some, as in the dura mater and periosteum; in others, scarcely perceptible, as in the aponeuroses. The presence of nerves has never been proved, although several circumstances, regarding their sensibility, render their existence probable. The fibrous membranes serve, in general, to augment the solidity of the organs which they envelop; to retain the muscles in their respective positions; to favour the motion of the limbs, and that of the muscles and skin; to form canals and rings for the passage of different organs, &c.

Bichat admits three species of Com'pound Mem'branes. 1. The Se'rofi'brous, formed of a serous and fibrous lamina, intimately adherent to each other;—as the pericardium, dura mater, and tunica albuginea. 2. The Se'romu'cous, formed of a serous and mucous lamina;—as the gall-bladder at its lower part. 3. The Fi'bromucous, constituted of the union of a fibrous and mucous membrane; as the mucous membrane of the nasal fossæ, gums, &c. Chaussier admits six kinds of membranes. 1. The lam'inated. See Cellular Tissue. 2. The se'rous or sim'ple vil'lous. 3. The follic'ular or com'plicated vil'lous. 4. The mus'cular or flesh'y. 5. The albugin'eous. 6. The albu'minous.

Membrane, False, Acciden'tal or Adventit'ious membrane, Pseu'domem'brane, Pseud'ymen, Pseudome'ninx, (F.) Fausse membrane, M. accidentelle. Membranous productions, which form on all the free natural surfaces, and on every free accidental surface, are so called. They are, in general, produced by the exudation of a fibrinous matter, susceptible of organization, which takes place in consequence of inflammation of the various tissues. These accidental membranes occur on the skin after the application of a blister; on mucous surfaces, as in croup; on the parietes of inflamed veins and arteries, &c. The cicatrices of wounds are formed of them.

By some it has been proposed to give the name pseudo-membrane to fibrinous exudations, as in diphtheritis, which are devoid of organization, whilst neo-membrane may be applied to such fresh productions, as from serous membranes, as have become supplied with vessels and nerves.

The sanguinous evacuation from the uterus; San'guis men'struus, Men'strual blood, the monthly occurrence of which constitutes menstruation or monthly illness. The first appearance of the menses—menopha'nia—is usually preceded by the discharge of a fluid whitish matter from the vagina: by nervous excitement, and by vague pains and heaviness in the loins and thighs; numbness of the limbs, tumefaction and hardness of the breasts, &c. More or less indisposition and irritability also precede each successive recurrence of the menstrual flux. In temperate climates, each period, men'strual period, peri'odus luna'ris, ordinarily continues from three to six days; and the quantity lost varies from four to eight ounces. The menses continue to flow from the period of puberty till the age of 45 or 50. At the term of its natural cessation, Menolip'sis, Ménespausie (Gardanne), Menopaus'is, the flux becomes irregular; and this irregularity is occasionally accompanied with symptoms of dropsy, glandular tumours, &c., constituting the Parame'nia cessatio'nis of Good, and what is called the critical time or turn or change of life; yet it does not appear that the mortality is increased by it. With the immediate causes of menstruation we are unacquainted. We express only our ignorance, when we assert it to depend upon periodicity; the discharge comes from the vessels of the uterus and vagina, and differs from ordinary blood by its peculiar odour, and by its not coagulating. It is evidently connected with the condition of the ovaries, and—it is generally supposed—with the periodical discharge of ova from them. It is arrested, as a general principle, during pregnancy and lactation. In warm climates, women usually begin to menstruate early, and cease sooner than in the temperate regions. The quantity lost is also greater. In the colder regions, the reverse of this holds as a general rule.

Dried menstrual blood, especially of a woman in her first menstruation—Sanguinis vir'ginis pri'mum menstrua'tæ—was formerly given internally as an anti-epileptic.

It consists in a comparative measurement of each side of the chest, by means of a riband extended from the median line of the sternum to the spine. When effusion exists on one side, the measurement is usually greater than on the other. When, on the other hand, a portion of a lung has ceased, for some time, to exert its respiratory functions, the corresponding side of the chest becomes smaller, in consequence of the contraction of the pleura, retraction of the pulmonary tissue, and greater approximation of the ribs. Instruments have been devised for this purpose. See Stethometer.

In this hernia, the viscera issue from the abdomen through the crural canal; or through an opening immediately on the outer side of Gimbernat's ligament, which gives passage to lymphatic vessels. This affection is more frequent in the female than in the male, and especially in those who have had children. The tumour, formed by merocele, is generally small, round, and more or less difficult of reduction. In other respects, it possesses all the characters of hernia. The neck of the sac has, close on the outside, the epigastric artery; above, the spermatic cord and spermatic artery in the male —the round ligament in the female; on the inside, Gimbernat's ligament; and, below, the pubes. When the obturator artery arises from the epigastric, it generally passes on the outside of and below the orifice of the sac; sometimes, however, takes a turn above, and then to the inside of the opening. J. Cloquet asserts, that of 134 cases, in one only did he find the epigastric artery on the inside of the orifice of the sac.

The operation, required in strangulation of this variety, may be practised on the aponeurotic opening, by cutting downwards and inwards on the side of Gimbernat's ligament.

MESENTER'IC, Mesara'ic, Mesenter'icus, Mesara'icus, Mesaræ'icus, (F.) Mésentérique, Mésaraïque. That which relates or belongs to the mesentery.

MESENTERIC AR'TERIES are two in number, and distinguished into, 1. The Supe'rior mesenter'ic, which arises from the anterior part of the abdominal aorta, below the cœliac. It immediately descends to the left, forwards, behind the pancreas, and in front of the third portion of the duodenum,—to gain the superior extremity of the mesentery, where it makes a long curvature, the convexity of which is turned forwards and to the left. Towards the termination of the ileum, it ends by anastomosing with a branch of the A. colica dextra inferior. At its concavity, it gives off the three Arteriæ colicæ dextræ, which belong to the great intestine; and, at its convexity, it sends off fifteen or twenty branches, which are distributed to the small intestines, after having formed numerous arches by their anastomoses.

2. The Infe'rior Mesenter'ic Ar'tery arises from the anterior part of the abdominal aorta, an inch and a half before its termination. It descends, on the left side, behind the peritoneum; engages itself in the substance of the iliac mesocolon, forming a considerable curvature, whose convexity faces the left side. When it reaches the brim of the pelvis, it passes along the posterior separation of the mesorectum, and attains the neighbourhood of the anus, under the name Superior hemorrhoidal artery. It gives off no branch at its concave part; but, from the convex, the three Arteriæ colicæ sinistræ arise.

MESENTERIC DISEASE, Tabes mesenterica.

MESENTERIC GLANDS are the lymphatic ganglions of the mesentery. Through them, the chyliferous vessels pass to the thoracic duct. Their uses are unknown. When diseased, nutrition is interfered with, and atrophy produced.

MESENTERIC HER'NIA. If one of the layers of the mesentery be torn by a blow, whilst the other remains in its natural state, the intestines may insinuate themselves into the aperture, and form a kind of hernia. It is not known during life.

MESENTERIC PLEX'USES are furnished by the solar plexus, and have been distinguished into superior and inferior; like the mesenteric arteries which they accompany.

MESENTERIC or MESARA'IC VEINS are two in number, and belong to the vena porta. They are distinguished into, 1. The Superior mesenteric or mesaraic or great mesaraic. This trunk receives, from above to below and on the right side, the three venæ colicæ dextræ and the Gastroepiploica dextra. Into its left side, the veins of the small intestine open. It passes in front of the transverse portion of the duodenum; and, behind the pancreas, unites with the splenic vein to concur in the formation of the vena porta.

The inferior or lesser mesenteric vein corresponds to the artery of the same name, and opens into the splenic, near the union of that vein with the superior mesenteric, and behind the pancreas.

(F.) Mésentère. A term in anatomy, applied to several duplicatures of the peritoneum, which maintain the different portions of the intestinal canal in their respective situations; allowing, however, more or less motion. They are formed of two laminæ, between which are contained the corresponding portion of intestine and the vessels that pass to it. One only of these duplicatures has received the name mesentery, properly so called. This belongs to the small intestine, which it suspends and retains in situ. Its posterior margin, which is the smallest, is straight, and descends obliquely from the left side of the body of the second lumbar vertebra to the right iliac fossa. Its anterior margin is curved, undulating, plaited, and corresponds to the whole length of the small intestine. The mesentery contains, between the two laminæ which form it, a number of lymphatic ganglions; the trunks and branches of the mesenteric vessels; the nervous plexuses accompanying them, and many lacteals and lymphatics,

A term, proposed by Professor Owen, to express the changes of form, which one animal species undergoes in a series of successively produced individuals, extending from the one developed from the ovum to that which becomes the image or last perfected individual. This term he employs in contradistinction to metamorphosis, which he restricts to the changes of form undergone by one and the same individual. See Generation, alternate.

METAL, (μεταλλον,) Metal'lum. A class of simple, bodies; in general, distinguished from others by considerable specific gravity; a particular splendour; almost total opacity; insolubility in water; and the property they have of ringing when struck. Metals have no effect, except of a mechanical nature, when taken into the stomach; unless they have already undergone, or undergo in the stomach, oxidation or union with an acid; when, at times, deleterious compounds may be formed. Copper cents; half-pence; quicksilver; lead, have frequently been swallowed in the metallic state with impunity. Tin and mercury are the only metals prescribed for a mechanical effect; the former as an anthelmintic, —the latter, idly enough, in cases of fancied intussusception.

This affection sometimes depends on a slight opacity in the transparent parts of the eye: the cornea, crystalline, or vitreous humour, when it is symptomatic and of no consequence. At other times, it appears to be idiopathic; and occurs particularly in those who have been in the habit of constantly fixing their eyes on very brilliant or small bodies. The objects fancied to be seen are various. They are sometimes circular, perpetually moving; or shining, or black spots, cobwebs, insects, or pieces of wool — when they are often termed Mus'cæ seu Floc'ci volitan'tes, (F.) Mouches volantes, and the condition Vi'sus musca'rum, Scotom'ata, Suffu'sio Myo'des, Myiodeop'sia, Myiodop'sia, Myodeopsia, Myodeso'pia, Visus musca'rum. These appearances sometimes continue for a few days; being dependent on the state of the nerves of the individual at the time; or they may exist for life, and ultimately impair the sight. Certain of them change their position, and appear to be seated in the humours of the eye, and—it has been supposed — in the vitreous humour more especially: hence the term Autohy'aloid muscæ applied to them.

If the affection be symptomatic, it is of but little moment. If idiopathic, and connected with any excitement of the brain, which is not often the case, attention will have to be paid to that organ.

A change in the seat of a disease; attributed, by the Humorists, to the translation of the morbific matter to a part different from that which it had previously occupied: and by the Solidists, to the displacement of the irritation. It has also been used in the same extensive sense as Metaptosis. Disputes have often been indulged, whether a case of metastasis ought not rather to be esteemed one of extension of the disease. The phenomena of gout and acute rheumatism are in favour of metastasis occasionally supervening.

METASTAT'IC, (μεταστατικος,) Metastat'icus, (F.) Métastatique. Belonging or relating to metastasis. A metastatic crisis is one produced by metastasis:—a metastatic affection, one caused by metastasis, &c. See Abscess, metastatic.

METASYN'CRISIS, (μετασυγκρισις, from meta, and συγκρινω, 'I join.') Recomposi''tion. A word employed by some disciples of Asclepiades. This physician supposed, that animals are formed by the union or assemblage of atoms. He designated all bodies by the word συγκριματα, which signifies 'assemblage.' Συγκρινεσθαι, 'to be assembled,' was, with him, synonymous with 'to exist;' and διακρινεσθαι, 'to separate,' was, with him, synonymous with 'to dissolve,' 'to cease to exist.' The word Metasyncrisis was invented to express the recomposition of bodies after their momentary dissolution. Some have rendered the word by the Latin Recorpora'tio.

These branches are distributed in the interosseous spaces.

Metatarsal Articula'tions are those resulting from the junction of the metatarsal bones with each other. They are strengthened, behind, by dorsal and plantar ligaments; and before, by a transverse metatarsal ligament, which is plantar, and has the greatest analogy to the inferior transverse metacarpal ligament.

METEOROL'OGY, (μετεωρολογια), Meteorolog''ia, (μετεωρος, (meta, and αιωρεω, 'I lift up,') 'a meteor,' and λογος, 'a discourse.') The science, whose object is the knowledge of the origin, formation, appearance, &c., of meteors. The state of the atmosphere has a most important bearing upon the health of animals. Every epidemic affection has its causes seated there. Meteorological conditions have, hence, ever been attended to by the physician for the purpose of detecting the precise character of any particular epidemic influence. The barometer, thermometer, and hygrometer are the instruments used with this intent—to detect, as well the varying weight or pressure, and the temperature, as the moisture. Perhaps, of the three conditions, the last exerts more influence in the production of disease than either of the others. Our knowledge, however, of this part of physics is extremely limited and unsatisfactory.

A sect of physicians whose doctrine was in vogue after that of the Empirics and Dogmatists, towards the end of the first century. According to the Methodists, of whom Themison was the chief, almost every disease is dependent on contraction or relaxation —strictum or laxum. To these two causes, they added a third — mixed or compound — to include those affections which partook of the two characters. The doctrine, Medici'na method'ica, Methodism'us, Meth'odism, resembled, in some respects, that of Themison.

It is known by the discharge of a clear, stringy fluid per vaginam; preceded by pains, which, from the hypogastric region, shoot to the thighs, groins, &c., with more or less fever. It requires the antiphlogistic treatment. Chronic metritis sometimes succeeds the acute. An effusion of blood from the inner surface of the uterus, either at the menstrual or other period; but in a greater quantity than proper. Uterine hemorrhage may be caused by those influences which produce hemorrhage in general. It happens, however, more frequently during pregnancy, and during or after delivery, when the vascular system of the uterus is so circumstanced as to favour its occurrence more than at other times. The termination of metrorrhagia is usually favourable. Should it, however, be very copious, or frequently recur; or should it happen to a great extent after delivery, death may take place very speedily; and, in some cases, without the discharge being perceptible; constituting internal hemorrhage.

Uterine hemorrhage may be active or passive; requiring obviously a different treatment. The main management is similar to that of hemorrhage in general;—the horizontal posture; acid drinks; free admission of cool air; cold applications to the loins, thighs, and abdomen; injection of cold water, even of iced water, into the vagina; plugging the vagina, so as to prevent the discharge per vaginam, and thus induce a coagulum in the mouths of the bleeding vessels. Such will be the special plan adopted where the hemorrhage has occurred in one not recently delivered. In uterine hemorrhage after delivery, the same cooling plan must be followed; but, as the flow of blood is owing to the uterus not contracting so as to constringe its vessels, pressure must be made on the abdomen to aid this; and, if necessary, the hand must be introduced into the uterus to stimulate it to contraction. Should the female be excessively reduced, so as to render the accoucheur apprehensive that she may expire from loss of blood, excitants may be exhibited. The profuse exhibition of opium in such cases is, at least, a doubtful plan.

Transfusion has, at times, been practised as a last resource.

METRORRHEU'MA, gen. Metrorrheu'matis, Rheumatis'mus U'teri, Hysteral'gia rheumat'ica seu catarrha'lis, Metri'tis rheumat'ica, (F.) Rheumatisme de l'utérus; (metra, and ῥευμα, 'defluxion,' 'rheumatism.') Rheumatism of the uterus.

MIAS'MA, pl. Mias'mata, Mi'asm, (μιασμα, 'a stain,' from μιαινω, 'I contaminate.') Miam'ma, Mian'sis, Mia'ria, Mias'mus, Inquinamen'tum, Moly'sis, Conta'gium. The word miasm has, by some, been employed synonymously with contagion. It is now used more definitely for any emanation, either from the bodies of the sick, or from animal and vegetable substances, or from the earth, especially in marshy districts, (Marsh pois'on, Efflu'vium palus'trē, Gas palus'trē, Limnomephi'tis, (F.) Intoxication des Marais,) which may exert a morbid influence on those who are exposed to its action. To these terrestrial emanations—the Koinomias'mata of Dr. E. Miller, of New York—the Italians give the name aria cattiva, but, more commonly, malaria ('bad air'); a word which has been adopted into other languages. The deleterious effluvia, originating from the decomposition of matter derived from the human body, have been called by Dr. Miller, Idiomias'mata; the epithets Koino and Idio being derived respectively from κοινος, 'common,' and ιδιος, 'personal.' Of the miasms which arise either from the animal body or from the most unhealthy situations, we know, chemically, nothing. All that we do know is, that, under such circumstances, emanations take place, capable of causing disease in many of those who are exposed to their action.

MILK, (Sax. melc.) Lac, Ga'la. Hu'mor lac'teus, La'tex ni'veus, (F.) Lait. A fluid secreted by the mammary glands of the females of the mammalia. The skimmed milk of the cow, (F.) Lait de Vache, contains water, caseous matter, traces of butter, sugar of milk, chloride of sodium, phosphate, and acetate of potassa, lactic acid, lactate of iron, and earthy phosphates. The cream is formed of butter, casein, and whey, in which there is sugar of milk and salts. When examined by the microscope, milk is seen to contain a large number of particles, of irregular size and shape, varying from $\frac{1}{1\,2\,7\,0\,0}$th to $\frac{1}{3\,0\,4\,0}$th of an inch in diameter, floating in a colorless fluid—liquor lactis. They consist of oily matter, surrounded by a delicate pellicle, and are the milk globules.

Cow's milk is employed for the preparation of cream, butter, cheese, whey, sugar of milk, and frangipane. It is useful in a number of cases of poisoning; either by acting as a demulcent, or by decomposing certain poisons, or by combining with others so as to neutralize them. It is constantly employed as aliment, and may be regarded as an emulsion in which butter and casein are found in suspension. When taken into the stomach, it is coagulated by the gastric fluids, and the coagulum is digested like any other solid. The watery parts are absorbed.

Between milk, flour, and blood, there is great similarity of composition. The following table is given by Dr. Robert Dundas Thomson:

Milk.	Flour.	Blood.
Curd or Casein	Fibrin, Albumen, Casein, Gluten,	Fibrin, Albumen, Casein. Colouring matter.
Butter . . .	Oil.	Fat.
Sugar . . .	Sugar, Starch,	Sugar.
Chloride of potassium, ——— sodium, Phosphate of soda, ——— lime, ——— magnesia, ——— iron,	Do.	Do.

From a considerable number of experiments, Messrs. Deyeux and Parmentier class the six kinds of milk, which they examined, according to the following table, as regards the relative quantity of materials they contain.

Casein.	Butter.	Sugar of Milk.	Serum.
Goat	Sheep	Woman	Ass
Sheep	Cow	Ass	Woman
Cow	Goat	Mare	Mare
Ass	Woman	Cow	Cow

Milk, Goats', (F.) Lait de Chèvre, resembles cows' milk: the butyraceous matter, however, which enters into its composition, is more solid than that of the cow.

Artific''ial Goat's Milk may be made by taking fresh suet ℥j; cutting it into small pieces; tying it in a muslin bag, large enough to leave the morsels free from compression; and boiling in a quart of cow's milk, sweetened with a quarter of an ounce of white sugar candy.

Used as a diet in scrofulous cases, and also in phthisis.

It is attributed in cattle to something eaten or drunk by them; and in man to the eating of the flesh of animals labouring under the disease. Owing to the tremors that characterize it in animals, it is called the Trem'bles. It is endemic.

The symptoms of the disease are such as are produced by the acronarcotic class of poisons—vomiting, purging, extreme nervous agitation, &c.: and the approved indications of treatment appear to be—gentle emetics and laxatives, with quiet, and mucilaginous drinks.
